Matt Rosenberg is the Chief Revenue Officer at Grammarly. He is responsible for leading all B2B revenue, operations, and growth for Grammarly Enterprise and Grammarly for Education. Matt is passionate about cross-functional collaboration and works closely with Grammarly's product, engineering, and marketing teams to ensure that the product's value proposition and innovation are aligned.

Previously, Matt served as the CRO at Compass, where he took the company into the Fortune 500 and significantly contributed to an eightfold increase in business growth. Before that, he was the CRO at Eventbrite, leading the global ticketing and registration business and overseeing global expansion to make Eventbrite the largest event platform in the world by event count. He also built and led ServiceSource's global revenue organization, which resulted in significant increases in revenue and valuation.

Matt holds a BA from Indiana University and a law degree from Northwestern University's Pritzker School of Law. During his early years as an attorney focused on corporate financing, mergers and acquisitions, and security, he discovered his passion for the inner workings of growing a business.

Apart from his work, Matt enjoys expanding his worldview through travel and adventure, whether trekking to Everest Base Camp or exploring mountain bike trails closer to home. He's also a proud husband and father of three.
