2020 was a year like no other

A global pandemic. Unprecedented wildfires here in Oregon. And a clear calling to address racial inequity in our communities. Difficult challenges to say the least and ones we are still facing today.

2020 was also a year like no other for the PGE Foundation. Our founding board chair, Gwyneth Gamble Booth, officially stepped down after 24 years at the helm. During her extraordinary time at the foundation, over $25 million was invested in the community. She set the bar high!

As we look forward, there’s been much to learn from 2020. It has reinforced the importance of collaboration, how we work together to be flexible and responsive, and how we rise up together to help our neighbors during these difficult times.

Our community partners spent the year on the front lines, tirelessly addressing hunger, homelessness, racial inequity and economic insecurity through an uncertain time. For our part, the PGE Foundation gave nearly $1.7 million this past year alone — 50% more than the previous year! We’ve been part of amazing stories that capture the human spirit and a passion for giving. We are eager to share some of them in this report and hope you’ll be as inspired by them as I am.

Gwyneth’s leadership through decades of expanding impact, has helped pave the way and I look forward to following in her footsteps to meet the diverse needs of Oregonians and collaborate with community and other philanthropic organizations to best serve all of our neighbors.

Thank you for entrusting me with my new role as PGE Foundation chair. I’m humbled and excited to be part of strengthening our communities in the years to come.

Sincerely,

Peggy Fowler
PGE Foundation Chair
Creating a better path forward

Last fall, the PGE Foundation partnered to fund a new social impact program empowering the next generation of Oregonians to create cleaner, greener, more equitable communities. The program, named PGE Project Zero, invests heavily in green job opportunities for young adults disconnected from work and school and greenspace development in communities disproportionately feeling the impacts of climate change.

We’re proud to say, the project is already producing great outcomes. Seven young adults recently completed an intensive six-month internship with community environmental groups and are ready to launch the next chapter of their careers.

“PGE has given us interns a great opportunity to become contributing members of our community. It’s refreshing to have a company give people of color an opportunity at diversifying a traditionally white workplace,” said Adam Baek, PGE Project Zero Works intern.

“Facing the challenges of 2020 head on

It’s amazing how difficult times can often bring out the best in people and organizations. This past year was no exception as the PGE Foundation and our partners found new ways to serve Indigenous communities and immigrant communities hit hard with the challenges created by the pandemic, racial inequities and the wildfires.

“Many Oregon families faced the dueling economic and social challenges of the COVID-19 pandemic and wildfires,” said Kregg Arntson, executive director of the PGE Foundation. “Through that difficult time, the PGE Foundation walked alongside our longtime community partners as they assisted families in need of access to housing, food, mental health services and other critical support.”

Along with New Seasons Market and other funders, we provided additional funds to the Oregon Worker Relief Fund (OWRF) as COVID-19 cases spiked in immigrant communities experiencing barriers to accessing federal assistance. About one in eight workers in Oregon is an immigrant, making up a sizable share of the state’s labor force. In fact, many of those receiving relief through the OWRF are among the state’s essential workers in agriculture, food service, janitorial industry, construction and childcare. Another group hit hard in 2020 was the Indigenous population of the Confederated Tribes of Warm Springs. The unprecedented wildfires disrupted the Tribes’ ongoing efforts to restore access to clean water. The Foundation contributed to The Chúush Fund to support their efforts to restore this vital resource that so many of us take for granted.

Our youth hunger for knowledge about our changing climate and purposeful ways to make a difference.

During troubled times, the arts are even more important

During a crisis, funding of arts and culture is often the first thing to be cut. Well, not on our watch. Given the challenges of COVID-19, we believe investing in arts and culture is more important than ever — providing $235,000 to support our nonprofit partners and encouraging recipients to use the funds how they deemed most valuable as they adapted to these difficult times.

Many of our arts and culture organizations, including World Stage Theatre (WST), did just that by going virtual in 2020. The WST typically works with thousands of youth through workshops, live performances, after-school programs, camps and classroom settings. All of these increase students’ understanding of African American history as well as theater, language arts and history in general. This past year, they moved all their programs online, creating virtual experiences to inform, educate and entertain their audiences.

After a performance by the WST, one teacher noted: “My students returned to school and had a pretty intense discussion about the local and national systems of oppression and the micro-aggressions they witness and commit daily. For the kids of color, they spoke of feeling represented in ways that they previously have not experienced in theater. They felt seen. I cannot thank you enough for this.”

The PGE Foundation is proud to partner with the arts community and we will continue supporting efforts to address racial inequity and educate young people about Black history.

Of all the things on our plate, food should be first

The hunger rate in Oregon is at the worst point in a century, with one quarter of Oregonians worrying about how they’ll feed their families. Paying for food or paying the rent is not a choice any family should have to make.

The PGE Foundation responded with $325,000 in grants to the Oregon Food Bank, Partners for a Hunger Free Oregon and the Marion Polk Food Share. We also gave focused grants to support organizations working on the front lines of the pandemic response, as they help families overcome barriers and improve their quality of life. This includes Outgrowing Hunger.

Outgrowing Hunger, serves 450 immigrant and refugee families a year, including Bhutanese, Burmese, African, Latino and Slavic, helping them preserve their cultural identity of passing a healthy, whole-food based, traditional diet and active lifestyle to their children. All while creating and improving self-reliance and self-sufficiency in meeting their fresh, healthy food needs.
Making distance learning accessible for all

As families, students and teachers prepared for distanced learning last year, one fact came to the surface: Tens of thousands of students across Oregon did not have the technology to access online learning, connect with teachers, socialize with friends and more.

Enter Free Geek, a new PGE Foundation grantee. They organized TechNOW, a statewide campaign to collect unwanted personal laptops, tablets and cellphones. Once refurbished, they provided them to students across the state to help bridge this digital divide.

A good education is something we all benefit from and our community responded to keep students connected and engaged.
