Kakaa Denka

-The Silk Story of Gunma-

has been designated as "Japan Heritage."

Japan Heritages are stories based on unique regional histories and traditions from various Japanese localities, designated by the Japanese Agency for Cultural Affairs. In April of 2015, a total of 18 stories were designated as the first Japan Heritages, and one of them was "Kakaa Denka: The Silk Story of Gunma," composed of 13 cultural properties in the prefecture of Gunma. Among the 13 properties that have to do with silk, 6 of those can be found right here in Kiryu, a city known for its excellent silk products.

rock of the shrine.

A rock that makes silk-weaving sounds.

Pray for good luck in romance.

Brings good luck to romance!

Shirataki Shrine has long been known as a "powerspot". It enshrines Princess Shirataki, who brought the knowledge of silk weaving from Kyoto more than a thousand years ago. It is known as a "marriage shrine", for legend says that a young man traveled from Kiryu to the imperial court in Kyoto, wooed Princess Shirataki with poems and married her, overcoming their differences in class. There's also a large rock called "Korinseki" within the grounds of the shrine. If you put your ear to it, it's said you can hear the sound of the loom.

The Legend of Princess Shirataki

In the year 794, a young man traveled from Kiryu to Kyoto to serve in the imperial court. While he was caring for the garden in the palace, he met Princess Shirataki. The two overcame their class differences, and eventually married with permission from the emperor. Princess Shirataki spread her knowledge of silk weaving in the region. Because the two married despite their class differences, the shrine is said to bring good luck with marriages.

Kakaa Denka

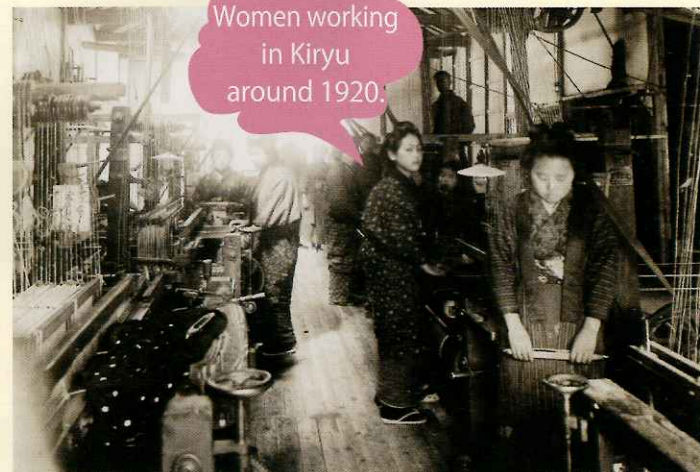

-The Silk Story of Gunma-

Here in Gunma, women have supported their families through the silk industry such as farming, throwing, and weaving. As technology progressed, women played major roles as silk factory workers and weavers, and many husbands spoke proudly of their wives as "best wife (kakaa) in the world". This eventually led to the birth of the "kakaa-denka" which not only became an iconic word in Gunma but became a Japanese expression that describes women who work outside and support their households.

Visiting the silk farms and textile factories full of dreams and passions of these "best wives in the world" will surely give you a vision of the women who supported the Japanese economy at the time.

Kiryu's Textiles

A traditional craft

Seven styles of Kiryu weaving

In 1977, Kiryu weaving with its seven styles was designated as a traditional craft.

The history of Kiryu's textiles goes back about 1,300 years. Kiryu was already established as a silk goods producing area stipulated in the tax law of the time. From the Meiji era, it continued to develop as it incorporated modern technology from overseas, and even today it is a center of the textile industry to the extent that people say "nothing beats textiles from Kiryu".

This highest-grade textile is known as omeshi (wearing) as it was favored by the shogun Tokugawa Ienari.

Patterns are woven with a single-color warps and wefts with 8 or more colors.

Patterns are woven with warps of 3 or more colors and wefts with 2 or more colors.

A complicated style where patterns are expressed on the front and back of a double-layer textile.

A style where warps of 2 or more colors are closely used to weave out a soft pattern like an embroidery.

A style where splashed patterns are woven with warps, and then additional patterns are woven with wefts.

A style where warps are intertwined with wefts creating spaces between weaves.
