

After a Suicide Attempt

This guide will discuss some of the thoughts and feelings a person who survives a suicide attempt might have. It also offers some ways family members and friends can help.

What do people feel or think after surviving a suicide attempt?

The person may have mixed emotions.

Feelings might include:

- Relief to be alive
- Shame
- Guilt
- Thankfulness
- Embarrassment
- Regret
- Depression
- Lack of memory
- Sinfulness
- Sense of being saved by divine intervention
- Ambivalence
- Confusion
- A sense of failure
- Anger

What can friends and family members do to help?

At first, you can...

- Let them know you love them.
- Let them know you're glad they are alive.
- Let them know you'll be there for support.
- Be there for them. While the person who has attempted suicide may not want to talk, your presence is needed.
- Offer to help them make connections to spiritual and cultural supports.
- Get support for yourself.

Later, you might want to...

- Give the person chances to talk freely about the attempt.
- Allow the person to talk about the events leading up to the attempt.
- Let the person know it's ok to tell someone if they feel suicidal.
- Give them the phone number of the local crisis line and emergency room.
- Ask the person if meeting with a therapist or counselor would be helpful.
- If they are not already seeing a counselor, suggest an evaluation by a doctor for depression or other illnesses.
- Help the person get back in touch with mental health workers and support people.

What does not help the survivor?

- Staying away from the person or their family.
- Expressing blame or anger toward the person, yourself, or others.
- Telling the person they should not talk about it.
- Telling the person they should talk about it before they are ready.
- Telling the person they should not feel as they do.

These are very common feelings.

If you are struggling with any of them, it is important for you to get support for yourself. Therapists, counselors and support groups can all help. They can help you to better understand how to support someone after a suicide attempt.
