

Managing Political Anxiety and Election Stress

Recent polls have shown that feeling stressed and uncertain about the upcoming 2024 election is becoming increasingly common, with more than 60% of survey respondents indicating a negative impact on their mental health. Political conflict and change are normal features of life, but in times of heightened tension and polarization, they can lead to widespread anxiety. The more closely a person's political stances are tied to their core values and beliefs, the more they may worry about the consequences of elections and other political changes. When "your side" loses, it can feel like the world is going off track in terrible and permanent ways. You may feel personally threatened in ways that trigger deep and uncomfortable emotions.

Compounding the emotional effect of political polarization is the constant access to the news through smartphones and other technology, often amplified by social media. It can feel like there's no escape from jarring and disturbing headlines. This year in particular, political anxiety is being added to baseline levels of worry that are still elevated by ongoing wars and the lingering effects of the COVID-19 pandemic. For many people, this can be a toxic emotional combination.

How can you manage your anxiety in times of political conflict and change while also remaining engaged in positive ways? After all, civic engagement is the cornerstone of democracy. The more people are involved in positive ways, the healthier our society and our communities will be. Following are some suggestions from mental health experts about how to stay involved while attending to your own wellbeing.

Stay Informed but Set Boundaries with Political News and Social Media Consumption

If you find the news to be emotionally taxing, set limits on how much you take in. Set aside a short block of time in the morning and early evening to catch up on political developments. Resist the temptation to check the headlines constantly throughout the day. Turn off nonemergency alerts from news feeds so they don't constantly grab your attention and distract you. Limit your exposure to political exchanges on social media.

Instead of waiting for the news to come to you, do research on issues that matter to you, seeking out well-researched and reliable sources. In the United States (U.S.), make an extra effort to understand how to vote in your state – how to register and what your options are for mail-in or in-person voting. Early voting might be an option to avoid lines and crowds, for example. If you are worried about mail delays, find out if your community is setting up drop boxes for mail-in ballots. Look at the election pages of your state's and community's websites to learn about the different ways to vote and any deadlines. Contact your local election commissioner if you have questions.

If there are delays in tallying the results after the election, try not to focus on premature and changing predictions. Give the process time to conclude and know that democracy is working.

Be Respectful in Conversations about Politics

In a polarized world, people may sometimes attach evil motives or negative attributes to those who disagree with their positions. Accept that people have different opinions – based on their life experience, their understanding of the world, and their values. Be open to listening to and learning from the views of others. Share your own views, when appropriate, in respectful and thoughtful ways. A good way to hear another person and to be heard is to share the life stories that lie behind their (and your) views and opinions. This gives you an opportunity to connect on a human level and to explore the gray areas of difficult subjects, instead of simply disagreeing based on oversimplified assumptions. Look for the areas where you agree and the experiences you have shared and build from that.

Be mindful of your surroundings, too, when you express your political views. It's generally not appropriate to debate political differences at work, for example, or to force a political conversation on a coworker. Even when you have an interested listener, be aware of who else is within range to hear your conversation and who might be offended or upset by your views. Political discussions among family members or friends with different views can also become emotional. Given how difficult it is to change a person's views, consider whether it's worth risking important relationships to have those conversations. It may be better to focus on shared interests.

If a conversation about politics becomes heated and unproductive at work or socially, politely step away from it or change the subject. Resist the temptation to get in the last word.

Get Involved

One of the most important actions you can take to maintain a sense of control in a turbulent world is to get involved. You can try these ideas:

- Find opportunities to volunteer in your community or for a cause you care about deeply.
- Engage in small acts of kindness toward neighbors or people in need.
- Attend a city council or town hall meeting to listen and learn about local issues.
- Share your ideas with elected officials and others in your community.
- Volunteer to help with a political campaign.
- Sign up to help your local election board as a poll worker.
- Educate yourself on an issue you care about and find ways to help organizations that are working to make a difference in that area.

When you take positive and responsible action, it helps your community and society at large. It also helps you overcome feelings of helplessness and powerlessness.

Take a Long-term Perspective

One side will win, and one will lose in every election; just as one argument will win, and one will lose in every court case. But each election and court case are just a step in the longer arc of history. Opposing forces push in one direction, then another, and somehow countries, communities, and individuals get through troubling times. When you find yourself caught up in anxiety about today's news, think back to other contentious times and the progress that has been made from generation to generation.

It's appropriate to be impatient for changes you think are important and to get involved in pushing for them. But it's also important to understand that big changes take time, and that progress rarely follows a straight and steady line.

Seek Calm in Your Community, Mindfulness, Faith, or Nature

Different people have different ways of finding calm in stressful times. Turn to your circle of supportive friends, practices like mindfulness and meditation, or your faith and community. Time in nature can also help you remove yourself – even if only for a few moments at a time – from the turbulence that is causing stress. With a calmer mind, you'll be better able to engage with the world as it is and find some peace.

Take Care of Yourself

- Take time to enjoy family and friends. This is important even when you can't be together in person. Supportive, social connections are key to maintaining physical and mental health.
- Get enough sleep. Follow a consistent bedtime routine, and avoid the stimulation of screen time, alcohol, or caffeine as bedtime approaches.
- Eat a healthy diet. Incorporate plenty of fruits, vegetables, and whole grains. Include sources for protein and healthy fats. Limit packaged foods and highly-processed foods.
- Be physically active. Include a walk or other activity in your daily routine. Physical activity is vital to staying healthy and has an important calming effect.
- Pursue interests and hobbies. Engage in activities that give you pleasure and absorb your full attention. Take an online class to learn a new skill or delve deeper into a lifelong passion.
- Find ways to laugh. Watch a funny movie or TV show. Spend time with friends who can make you laugh. Humor is wonderful medicine to counter worries.
- Avoid ineffective and potentially harmful coping mechanisms. This includes alcohol or substance misuse and abuse.

Seek Help

If stress feels overwhelming and anxiety, sadness, anger, or other strong emotions make it difficult to cope with your daily routine, seek help. Some emotional challenges are too big to tackle by yourself. A trusted friend may be able to help as a sounding board and sympathetic ear. Or you might benefit from the help of a professional mental health counselor or therapist. Your Employee Assistance Program is also here to help with coping with political anxiety and election stress.