

Long-Term Stock Exchange Postponing Schedule, Continuing Test Dates

Long-Term Stock Exchange is postponing our phase-in schedule and will no longer open with test securities on Friday, April 24. This decision reflects the challenge our community is facing in adapting to the current environment, and the need to provide additional testing for our members.

LTSE understands the importance of managing internal and external resources and activities in the time of a national crisis. We also understand the importance of completing the necessary testing with our members. The Exchange's test facility will continue to be available for members to participate in and we will offer additional industry weekend testing events as we near the launch of test securities.

As part of our routine readiness preparations, the Exchange will be testing its production environment on Saturday April 25, and May 2. While we do not consider these formal member tests, any firms that wish to test with us on those dates should contact us as specified below.

We will continue to accept membership applications and coordinate connectivity to our production environment.

The adjusted phase-in schedule of test and non-test securities will be released in future market announcements. We will continue to provide regular updates.
