JOAN is pleased to present Servane Mary: Remakes 2006-2018 , a collection of works appropriating press images of iconic women from the 1940s to the 1970s printed onto cotton, silk, mylar blankets, glass, mirror, and metal.

Describing her work, Mary has said:

I am working with appropriated press images of women from the 1940s, to the '70s, some of whom are heroes of mine, some who are seen as anti-heroes, who are often misunderstood or mis-represented. This act of "re-figuration" explores the connections between representation, identity, history and memory, and in which I treat photographs as physical entities. They reveal traces of the passage of time, fading and deterioration, a surface that parallels our own recollection and the human mind. They are carried on materials and supports that encourage a reevaluation of the subjects, allow for the inclusion of the viewer, and destabilize the idea of a fixed position vis-a-vis our place in the world.

I am not so much interested in exposing the mechanics of the image-making industry as in establishing a 'subjective encyclopedia,' one that is experienced by way of numerous material associations and the female body—scarves, veils, hosiery, leggings, negligees, and so on. These create a "second skin" for images of the "second sex." The blankets are associated with maternal care, while the use of fabric in long, hanging sections relates to political banners. When the material remains light and semi-transparent, the viewer is encouraged to consider how visual information today is permeable, a curtain behind which meaning ultimately resides.
