Tough Year for Altcoins

| | | | | | | | |
|------------|--------------------|-------------------|------------------|---------------|----------------|-------------|-------------------|
| BTC | $61,278.93 | S&P500 | 5,022.21 | US 10Y | 4.5894% | WTI | $82.78 |
| | -4.0% | | -0.6% | | -0.0801PPT | | -3.0% |

- $BTC briefly dipped to the $59,678 mark before rebounding to $61,278, with most of the sell-off occurring during US hours. This marked the first time $BTC had traded below $60k since early March.
- Following the recent sell-off, Bitcoin Dominance has returned to 55.5%, while ETH/BTC stands at the 0.485 level.
- In the altcoin sector, Worldcoin has introduced its own layer2 solution called World Chain, $OMNI has been listed on Binance, and Merlin Chain is set to be listed on OKX.
- Most altcoins are trading in negative territory, with $WIF, $TAO, and $RDNR being the biggest losers, while the biggest gainers were $INJ, $MNT, and $KAS.

Tough Year for Altcoins

One interesting dynamic we've seen under-reported in traditional media is how much large altcoins have underperformed the "majors" of BTC and ETH. Despite the majors down 16~25% since their March highs, year-to-date performance is still solid, with the BTC spot ETF launch at the start of the year having provided strong tailwinds. However, altcoins, after a strong Q4 2023 where many returns over 100% on the quarter, have dipped deep into negative performance YTD in 2024. These are well-funded, large market-cap coins ($0.75~12.5B) which entered 2024 as market favourites, but after starting the year struggling to keep up with the majors, many of them are already down more than 50% from their March highs. One explanation is a reset in positioning, as a lot of leveraged accounts chased the upside in Q4 last year. With the majors continuing to trade heavy, it will be interesting to see if the once-darlings of the markets can catch a bid.
