- Finally, the long-awaited Bitcoin halving occurred over the weekend. However, there was minimal price action, with BTC mostly trading range-bound after a rally during Asian hours on Friday. Currently, $BTC is trading at $64,940 and $ETH at $3,147.
- Earnings season is back, with Tesla, Visa, Meta, Microsoft, Google, Amazon, and Intel. In macroeconomic news, anticipated releases include US GDP and PCE data.
- In the altcoin sector, the ZKasino issue was the talk of the town at Token2049 Dubai as the latest rug-pull incident. Additionally, this week marks the SEA Blockchain Week in Bangkok.
- During the last 24 hours, $NEAR, $STX, and $PEPE were the top gainers, while $INJ, $MKR, and $GRT were the biggest losers.

Rune's 'les Deux-Jours'

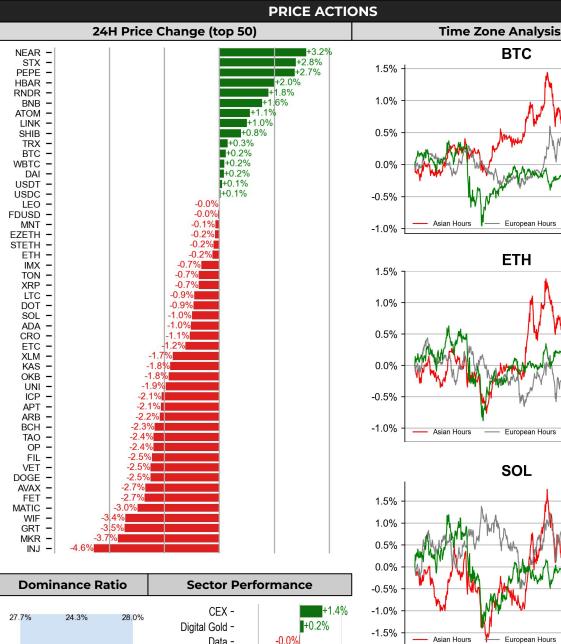

The Bitcoin community got a glimpse into the workings of Bitcoin network in not-so-distant future this weekend, when the miners' post-halving revenue briefly surpassed the pre-halving level. Immediately after the halving (at block heights 840,000), miners between blocks 840,000 and 840,179 reaped 12.867 BTC per block on average vs. 6.776 BTC between blocks 839,848 to 839,900. This is due to the spike in the network fee caused by the frenzy of activities on Rune Protocol - a much anticipated new token-minting standard on the Bitcoin blockchain built by the Ordinals creator Casey Rodarmor. The revenue came down now as the frenzy faded away but for the two days anyone concerned about the Bitcoin network's long-term security got a taste of how the risk could be dealt with - i.e. via network fee increase large enough to offset block reward cuts.
