- The market remains muted with little price action. As of now, $BTC is trading at $94,269 and $ETH at $1,798. Bitcoin dominance stands at 64.42%.
- The U.S. JOLTS report revealed a significant decline in job openings, falling to their lowest level in over a year—signaling a cooling labor market. This weaker-than-expected data has increased expectations for a Fed rate cut in June 2025, as it suggests reduced inflationary pressure.
- A few headlines include: Trump Media is reportedly exploring a utility token for the Truth Social ecosystem; BlackRock has filed to mirror its $150 billion money market fund on blockchain; and the SEC has delayed decisions on the proposed XRP and Dogecoin ETFs.
- Over the past 24 hours, the top three gainers were $SAFE, $LAYER, and $AI16Z, while the top three losers were $TRUMP, $DEEP, and $WAL.

Mastercard Advances Stablecoin Payments, Visa Next?

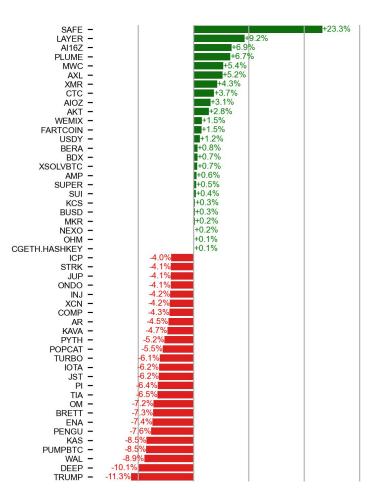

Mastercard unveiled a global initiative earlier this week, enabling 150 million merchants to accept stablecoin payments directly from crypto wallets. Partnering with Circle, Paxos, OKX, and Nuvei, the program supports wallet integration, card issuance (e.g., OKX Card), and efficient cross-border remittances via the Multi-Token Network, a proprietary blockchain-based integration platform. This is a significant step toward bridging Tradfi and crypto, potentially mainstreaming stablecoin use. Mastercard's approach appears more advanced than Visa's due to its end-to-end infrastructure, spanning real-time payments, merchant settlements, and user-friendly remittance tools. That said, game theory suggests Visa won't stay idle; at tonight's Global Product Drop, it may also make similar release, potentially building on past collaborations like Argent and Kulipa, to close the gap in global payment innovation. Watch this space.
