Library Tent
20 Pupils, 10m x 9m

“In contemplating with our children on how schools might return to normal after the lockdown, my partner Marianne Christiansen inspired me to consider outdoor learning, something that schools in Denmark have already adopted for their classes using tent-like structures.”

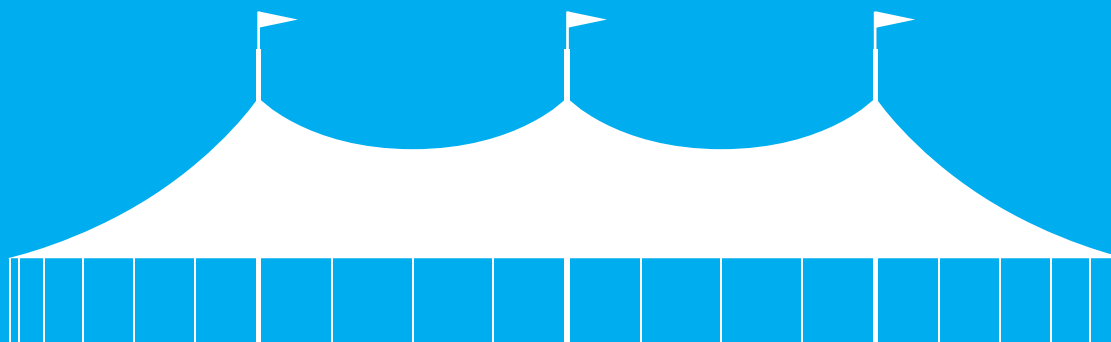

Wayne Head, director, CLTH

Teaching in the Round
20 Pupils + 1 Teacher, 12m dia. Tent

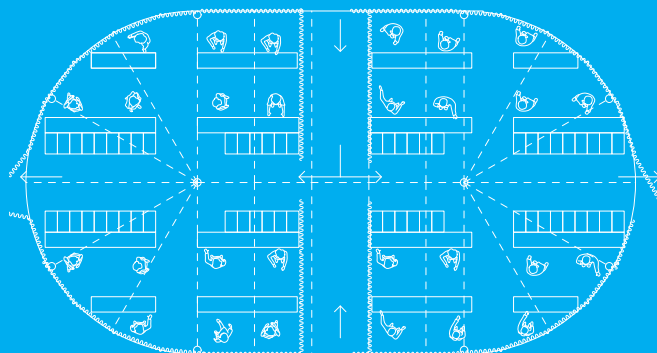

“Brilliant idea – the students will remember their time in the tent – like the millennium dome, learning zones, flexible, temporary, adaptable – and plenty of air and physical distance space.”

Professor Trevor Butler

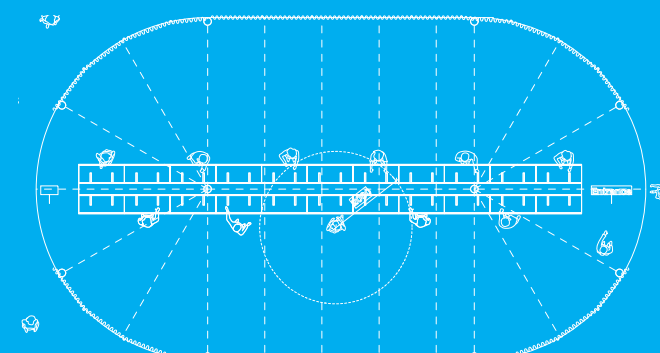

“What a good idea – shows how retrograde current space standards have become and how a simple change of direction can make a sensible strategy change quickly and easily.”

Aidan Ridyard

Curl la Tourelle Head Architecture (CLTH) have developed new concept to help mitigate restricted circulation routes within schools and maintain the necessary social distancing among pupils and staff for when schools reopen.

Their idea sees a series of temporary pop-up structures, each of which is arranged to follow the two-metre social distancing rule between pupils, with the adaptability to host different classroom setups. The architects propose reusing resources such as marquees from outdoor festivals that would otherwise be dormant during the current pandemic. This temporary provision will help liberate existing internal school space taking the pupil load off circulation areas, but also enhance air-flow contributing to individuals' wellbeing.

Through partnering with leading marquee company Original Marquees, the team are now able to provide schools with a rapid solution to the demand for more teaching space from initial briefing to delivery. CLTH are able to offer services that can fulfil each school's needs through, masterplanning, layout of teaching spaces and service co-ordination.
