

Go To Your Bed

Purpose

Having control over your dog is important no matter where you are, even at home. The “Go To Your Bed” exercise will help you prevent your dog from escaping or molesting your guests when answering the door. It also helps to keep your dog calm and under control during meals, when you have visitors or when you just need to relax.

To be fair to your dog, it’s important to provide plenty of exercise and make sure all its basic needs are met before asking it to control itself for any length of time or in areas of distraction. (See “Meeting Your Dog’s Basic Needs” Handout). You may choose to use this exercise only until your dog is calm or for longer periods of time.

The length of time your dog will be able to relax on its bed will vary from dog to dog and will increase over time if you are consistent with your training. It’s important to be fair and have realistic expectations in order to set your dog up for success. Puppies have a very short attention span and cannot be expected to control themselves for long periods of time. Older dogs with little or no training, fearful, stressed and anxious dogs will need to be trained gradually from the ground up. If your dog is fearful, stressed or anxious, these problems need to be addressed first. A blocked-off area or exercise pen is a better alternative when you can’t train or if you desire control for longer periods of time then what’s realistic for your dog.

Preparation

Place your dog’s bed, a comfortable mat or blanket in an area that’s draft free, and out of the line of traffic yet close to where you’ll be sitting. The idea is not to isolate your dog but to have it with you while calm and under control.

Begin this exercise with your dog on leash to set yourself up for success then remove the leash as your dog achieves success.

Practice this exercise when you’re relaxing, reading a book, watching a movie or your favourite television show making sure your focus is solely on your dog at the beginning. Start with very short exercises to ensure success and release your dog at the end of each repetition. Then gradually build to a fair and realistic length of time, distance and level of distraction.

Go To Your Bed

Procedure

- With a sweeping motion, point to your dog's bed while giving the "go to your bed" cue. With repetition your dog will recognize the sweeping motion as your hand signal.
- Lure your dog to its bed using a tasty, aromatic treat.
- Give your "down" cue and signal or lure your dog into a down position on its bed. (See page 3)
- Using the exercises presented below gradually teach your dog to lie down and hold its position until released. Begin by staying with your dog, gradually increasing the length of time, then distance from your dog followed by movement around the room.
- Then practice putting your dog in a stay on its mat while you sit in your chair and gradually build the length of time before releasing it. Remember to allow your dog to set the pace, reward it often enough to keep it playing your game and release it before it gets up on its own.

The following exercises will guide you through teaching your dog to lie down and hold a down stay until released.

It's easier for your dog to lie down from a sit, so let's begin with the exercise that teaches you how to lure your dog into a sit, then into a down position.

Luring Into Sit

1. Place a treat in front of your dog's nose. Move it slowly between your dog's eyes, then ears, then over its head. Your dog's head will go up as it follows the treat. The loss of balance this creates causes most dogs to sit.
2. The moment your dog's rear end hits the ground give your reward marker "YES" and reward your dog with a treat.

Go To Your Bed

Alternatives

- Offering Sits – Not all dogs will sit when lured. For some dogs it's better to show them the treat and wait for the sit. (See the “Offering Sits” exercise in the “Jumping Up” handout)
- Hold the Treat out of Reach – Other dogs respond better if you show them the treat then hold it out of reach above their heads because it's easier to see the treat when they're sitting.

Note

- If your dog is jumping for the treat, you have to either move it closer to its nose for luring or further out of reach as shown above.

Luring Into Down

1. To move your dog from the sit to the down position, keeping your momentum from the sit position, immediately place another treat in front of your dog's nose with your palm facing the floor. Slowly move the treat down your dog's chest to the floor until it lies down.
2. The moment your dog lies down, give your reward marker “YES” and reward your dog with a treat.

Go To Your Bed

Alternatives

Some dogs will not follow the lure into the down position. This is a common problem with small breeds and fearful dogs.

- Leg Bridge with a Lure – Sit on the floor with one knee raised just enough to allow your dog to fit under your leg. Lure your dog under your leg with a treat causing it to lie down as it crawls through the small opening. The moment it lies down give your reward marker and reward your dog with a treat.

Once your dog is lying down quickly you can switch back to the lure. Switching back is necessary because your lure movement will soon become a hand signal.

- Leg Bridge with a Trail of Treats - For dogs that will not follow a lure under your leg, your other option is to create a trail of treats for your dog to follow. The moment your dog lays down give your reward marker “YES” and reward your dog with a bigger treat.

Go To Your Bed

- Arm Bridge – You may choose to use your arm instead of your leg as a bridge and can choose between the trail of treats and the lure. Remember, when using an arm or leg-bridge, you are not pushing down on the dog – you are simply providing an opening that requires the dog to lie down in order to crawl through it.

- Capturing – It's not uncommon for timid or fearful dogs to avoid lying down in what they perceive to be a threatening environment. If your dog won't respond to the above techniques even at home, you can capture the behaviour at home by having your treats handy. When you notice your dog circling or preparing to lie down, quietly give your "down" cue. The moment it lies down give your reward marker "YES" and reward your dog with a treat.

When this is going well, try one of the above techniques. When your dog is responding at home, practice in other locations with low distraction. As your dog's confidence increases at the training facility and in new environments, your dog will perform there as well.

Note

- It's easier for a dog to lie down from a sit than it is from a stand position, so if your dog stands up, lure it back into the sit position and try again.
- If your dog stands up instead of lying down, avoid moving the treat away from your dog's chest or it may stand up to walk to the treat. Because every dog is different, some respond better if the treat is moved down its chest then across the floor away from it.
- If you lose your dog's attention, get your dog focused on the treat and try again, this time moving the treat more slowly so it stays on your dog's nose as you lure into the down position.
- With a few repetitions this position change will become easy for your dog.

Go To Your Bed

- If you're having difficulty achieving the down position, don't reward the dog for sitting, only for lying down. This way it learns that lying down is the only way to get the treat and it speeds up the learning process.
- When luring your dog into a down position, hold your treats in the palm of your hand with the palm of your hand facing the ground. This causes a "bridge" effect giving your dog the illusion that it must get under your "bridge" in order to get the treat.

Hand Signal for Down

You've been luring your dog into a "down" position by placing the treat in front of your dog's nose with your palm facing the floor, then slowly moving the treat down your dog's chest to the floor until it lies down. This lure movement will now become a hand signal.

Down Signal

Go To Your Bed

Creating the hand signal for down:

1. Begin this exercise crouched in front of your dog while it's in a sit position.
2. Your hand signal is the opposite of the "sit" signal. Begin with your hand at your shoulder with the palm facing out.
3. Using a quick, smooth movement, bring the palm of your hand from your shoulder down to the floor.

The moment your dog lies down give your reward marker "YES" and reward your dog with a treat.

Building Time

Purpose

The purpose of this exercise is practice to gradually build the length of time with your down-stay.

Procedure

Hold onto your dog's collar until it's successfully holding the stay in each position.

1. Give your down-stay cue and signal and count to three.
2. Give your reward marker "YES" and reward your dog with a treat.
3. Release your dog.
4. Count to five before switching positions or releasing your dog. When you're successful with five seconds count to seven, ten, etc.

Stand Up with your Dog in a Down Stay

The purpose of this exercise is to teach your dog to hold the down stay position as you stand and move away from it.

Procedure

1. Crouched in front of your dog, using your cue and signal, put your dog into the down position.

Go To Your Bed

2. Practice your “leave it” cue to teach your dog to keep its nose off the treat while in the down position. (See “Leave It and Take It” handout)

3. Give your cue to stay and either signal with an empty hand or quickly remove the treat from in front of your dog's nose to avoid luring your dog up with the treat.
4. If your dog reaches toward your hand go back to your “leave it” cue. When your dog relaxes into the down position, give your reward marker “YES” and give it the treat.

Go To Your Bed

5. Repeat this until your dog is relaxed in the down position.
6. Gradually change your body position until you are standing in front of your dog, reward and release your dog using the release cue you chose for the sit stay exercise. With each small change in body position, reward your dog for not standing up with you.

Norma Jeanne's holding her hand signal higher requiring Scruffy to look up without getting up

She rewards Scruffy each time she makes a change and he holds his position

She is now holding her hand signal even higher requiring Scruffy to look up while holding his down position

Note

Norma Jeanne is not holding Scruffy down by the collar – she's simply using one finger to prevent any forward movement toward the treat.

Because Scruffy is relaxed into the down position, Norma Jeanne releases his collar

She rewards him for holding his position

She now rises slightly from the crouched position and Scruffy holds his stay

Go To Your Bed

Norma Jeanne rewards Scruffy for holding his position

She stands a bit taller

Norma Jeanne is now standing while Scruffy remains in a down position

She rewards him again...

then releases him from the stay

7. When your dog is relaxed in the down position with you standing in front of it, move one foot back and forth and reward your dog for not getting up.
8. When this is successful, take one step away from your dog and immediately return as though you were a rubber band, reward and release your dog.
9. When this is successful you can take one step back and hold your position for the count of three.
10. When your dog is successful you can expand one of the two criteria for any "stay:"
 - a. Length of time
 - b. Distance from your dog

Go To Your Bed

Cordelia gives her stay cue and signal, takes one step back from Scruffy then immediately returns to him

Now she takes one step back and holds her position for the count of three before returning

This time she takes two steps back and holds her position

Go To Your Bed

Note

- This exercise is the foundation of your dog's stay for the rest of its life. If you succeed now, your stay will become longer and stronger, and something you'll be able to use in real life situations. If your dog gets in the habit of breaking the stay before it's released now, it'll be more difficult to create a reliable stay later. Remember, if you build a house on a weak foundation it will not stand.
- Always remember to reward your dog while it's holding the stay, before releasing it – never after. If you reward your dog after the release it'll continue to get up thinking that's the behaviour that earned the reward.
- Set your dog up for success. Only ask your dog to perform a stay it's capable of achieving. If you set your dog up to succeed it will. If you set it up to fail it will. For example, although you may have achieved a ten second stay during your previous session, if your dog is not feeling well or is highly distracted during your next training session, this may not be a reasonable request. Like us, dogs have good days and bad days, and times when they're more distracted than others.
- Be aware of your environment, how your dog is feeling, and adjust your expectations accordingly.

If your dog is not feeling well, is experiencing physical discomfort, is in pain, stressed, anxious or fearful your expectations should be limited to only what's necessary at the time and what the dog can successfully achieve. Under these circumstances I tend to avoid training unless absolutely necessary. For example; when my dog is not well she may require a visit to the vet clinic – these visits are always used as opportunities to train; but, if my dog is not up to it we simply avoid other dogs and people. In cases such as these, treating the illness problem is your first concern.

If your dog is exposed to a new distraction or the distraction is more intense due to volume or proximity – it becomes increasingly difficult for your dog to concentrate on you and respond to your requests.

When choosing your goals take the following into consideration:

- How your dog is feeling

Go To Your Bed

- Your dog's ability to focus and concentrate at that particular time
- Your location

New locations – even choosing to work on the opposite side of the room must be viewed as a new distraction. Just walking out your front door adds a myriad of new and potent distractions for your dog to process in the form of sights: sounds and smells. Keep in mind that your dog has four times your hearing and can smell things you're unaware of.

- a. Always allow your dog to set the pace

Only take the next step when the previous step is easy for your dog. Make sure your next step increases by only one of the following criteria at a time and is a small increase to once again ensure success.

- ✓✓ Length of your stay
- ✓✓ Distance from your dog
- ✓✓ Distance from the distraction
- ✓✓ Volume of the distraction

- b. New distractions in the environment

Once your dog is able to focus with a particular distraction at a distance, you can gradually increase the intensity of the distraction by shortening your distance or increasing the volume.

- If your dog breaks the stay, go back further than your last point of success and progress more slowly to ensure success.
- When working on short stays, always take a play break after three repetitions of the exercise. Once your stays are thirty seconds or longer, take a short play break after each release to help your dog clear its mind.

Go To Your Bed

- When expanding time or distance, only expand one criterion per exercise. Make sure time or distance is expanded in small increments such as one step each time or a few seconds longer to set your dog up for success. Only take the next step when your dog is successful with the last – let your dog set the pace.
- Always reward your dog then release it at the end of each repetition.
