Vitamin C

Vitamin C protects and maintains the health of cells. It helps to maintain the clarity and structure of skin, while also reducing stress on the blood vessels. Experts say the body requires 75-90mg per day to reap the benefits. It is also good for cartilage and bone health.

Niacin

Vitamin B3 is another name for niacin. The strength of blood vessel walls is directly affected by Niacin, which helps to improve heart health. Niacin is linked to weight loss because it stimulates metabolism. Niacin is one of few foods that consumers can add to their diets while on medication to lower cholesterol levels. It increases the good cholesterol which improves blood circulation.

Vitamin B6

Vitamins B6 help reduce nausea, and soothe the stomach. This is important for users who may feel nauseous after using new supplements. It improves the mood of users while also increasing their brain function. This is great for those who are looking to focus better. It is also known as pyridoxine and can support the immune system, maintain nerve function, and create antibodies.

Folic Acid

The majority of people believe that folic acids are only important for pregnant women and small children. However, the body needs a certain amount folate every day. Supplementation helps to counteract the risks of low folate, but also supports homocysteine. Folic acid is essential in utero because it improves the production of DNA and RNA. It can be used daily to help women prepare for pregnancy by supporting their red blood cells.

Vitamin B12

- Garlic helps reduce hypertension in people with hypertension.
- Olive leaves reduce cholesterol levels and inflammation.

- Hibiscus Flower supports liver and cardiovascular health.
- Buchu leaf is a natural remedy for arthritis and gout.
- Urva ursi is a natural anti-inflammatory that reduces the chance of infection.
- Juniper berry has antioxidant and antibacterial properties.
- The green tea leaf contains a variety of bioactive compounds.

This blend of ingredients will help consumers to maintain their health in general and boost their heart.
