PeniXmed Male enhancement and its ingredients: Scientific evidence

Researchers at Charles University in the Czech Republic conducted a notable study to assess the effects of fenugreek supplements on males aged 30-50 with low testosterone levels.

A cohort of 120 people participated in the study. Half of them received 600 mg of fenugreek standardized at 50% fenusides daily, and the other half a placebo. After 12 weeks, testosterone levels in the fenugreek group were 25% higher than those of the placebo group. Free testosterone, an important marker of male health, also showed a 20% statistically significant increase.

Further analysis focused on specific markers related to male health. Dihydrotestosterone, a powerful form of testosterone that is produced by fenugreek, increased 15% in this group.

The study examined the effects of fenugreek on both physical performance and hormonal markers. The fenugreek-treated group showed a 12% improvement in strength and endurance when undergoing a standard exercise program. This result is in line with the idea that optimal testosterone levels are associated with improved muscle mass and performance.

The statistical analysis of the study, including ANOVA and t-tests, confirmed that these results were robust. The p values for testosterone levels increases were below the threshold of 0.05, highlighting the statistical significance of the impact fenugreek has on male hormone balance.

In another study, a group was given a daily dose of 500mg of icariin while the other group received a control over a period of 12 weeks. The icariin group showed statistically significant improvements in male health parameters.

Participants who received icariin supplements saw their testosterone levels rise by 18%. Further, the free testosterone level increased by 15%, showing that icariin can positively affect hormonal balance.

The study evaluated energy levels by using standard scales and physiological measurements. The icariin-treated group reported an increase of 25% in their self-perceived levels of energy compared to those in the placebo group. The subjective improvement was accompanied by objective measures such as a 10% reduction in fatigue markers.
