What are the natural ingredients in Sugar Defender?

Take a look at the key ingredients that make Sugar Defender's formula for weight loss and blood sugar control so effective:

Coleus

The Coleus plant is native to South-East Asia and is usually grown as an annual herb. The vibrant foliage is available in green, purple and red. It belongs to mint family. The leaves have serrated edges, are lanceolate or ovate and have fine hairs covering their surface.

Coleus supports healthy blood sugar levels by its active component called forskolin. Forskolin increases the amount of cyclic Adenosine Monophosphate (cAMP), which is produced by cells.

Coleus also increases insulin secretion by pancreatic beta cells through an increase in intracellular cAMP. This mechanism increases glucose uptake in cells, improving glycemic regulation.

Maca Root

The maca root grows in high altitudes of the Andes Mountains of Peru. Indigenous cultures have used it for centuries because of its many health benefits.

In 2012, a study was published on the effects of maca on insulin sensitivity. In 2012, a study was conducted on the effects of maca root on insulin sensitivity and blood glucose stabilization.

Results of the study revealed that participants who consumed maca root showed significant improvements in insulin sensitivity when compared with those who received a placebo. Maca root supplementation led to a reduction in fasting blood sugar levels and improved glucose tolerance.

African Mango

The African mango is also known scientifically as Irvingia Gabonensis. It is a tropical, native fruit of West and Central Africa. It is distinguished by its large size and green skin with fibrous yellow flesh.

The high fiber content of African mangos is one of its key components. Dietary fibre is important in controlling blood sugar levels because it slows down the absorption glucose into the bloodstream from the digestive tract. This prevents rapid spikes in the blood sugar levels after meals.

African mango inhibits alpha amylase and alpha glucosidase. These enzymes break down carbohydrates to simple sugars when they are digested. African mango slows down carbohydrate digesting and can reduce glucose release into the bloodstream by inhibiting these enzymes.

Guarana

Guarana is derived from seeds of Paullinia Cupana, an Amazonian climbing plant.

The clinical analysis consisted of randomized controlled studies (RCTs), which investigated the effect of guarana on glycemic marker levels.

Meta-analysis showed that subjects who took guarana supplements had significantly lower fasting blood sugar levels than control groups.

Guarana supplements resulted in a significant decrease in the glycosylated haemoglobin (HbA1c). HbA1c is a measure of long-term control of blood sugar and an important marker in managing diabetes. The glycemic response to postprandial intake of guarana was also reduced compared to the controls.

Gymnema

The herb Gymnema can be found growing in tropical areas of India, Africa and Australia. This woody climbing plant features small yellow blooms and oval-shaped, elongated leaves.

Gymnema is gaining popularity because of its ability to control cravings for sugar and junk foods and prevent weight gain. It is believed that gymnemic acid, a compound found in the plant, has anti-obesity effects. These acids work with the taste receptors to temporarily block the ability of the tongue to taste sweet foods. It helps to reduce sugary food cravings by making them less attractive.

In addition, gymnemic acid may contribute to weight loss by preventing the absorption of glucose in the intestines. They help to regulate blood sugar and prevent excessive fat accumulation.
