STRONGER TOGETHER

What's powering creative impact?

“Creativity is at a crossroads. With the rise of technology and data, marketers are expected to be more tactical and exact in every brand action, however bold. And bold creativity requires guts. In the coming years, we’ll see how data, technology, and guts fall into balance.”

What a difference a year makes.

Our 2022 State of Creativity report found creativity in flux; pressure to produce great creativity at speed was made worse by a talent war and the challenge of convincing stakeholders of the need to invest in creativity.

This year sees much higher confidence in creativity.

There is a real desire to deploy great creativity for growth, but a sense that uncertainty is holding us back.

The pressing issues this year are macro - global uncertainty has put downward pressure on budgets. Creatives and marketers are having to work harder than ever to prove the value of creativity. Most important is demonstrating a clear link between creativity and commercial outcomes.

On the plus side, creativity has the interest of the C-suite. There is a call to bring the CEO and CFO in on the conversation and prove to them the value of investment in creativity and how it can power growth.

In this third edition of the state of creativity study you'll find:

1. Insights from our survey of over 2,400 creatives and marketers

What's on their minds, what's influencing the state of creativity in their worlds and what they are doing to use creativity to best effect.

2. Key trends on how to lead with creativity.

Learning from those doing well, such as how to:

- Build a happy relationship with AI to amplify human capabilities.
- Balance the long and the short by building brand-building devices into short-term activations.
- Forge deeper collaborations with the creator community.
- Instill best practice approaches across the marketing organisation which set firm foundations for great creativity to flourish.

This report is brought to you by LIONS Advisory, a team within the LIONS business dedicated to supporting brands with creative transformation. We help companies build the foundations for creative excellence and effectiveness, and set the conditions for creativity that wins awards and fuels growth. LIONS Advisory has worked with a broad range of renowned global brands across different categories.

This report is filled with examples taken from The Work, a platform with every Cannes Lions entry since 2001. We'd love to hear from you if you have any ideas or would like to discuss the findings further.

LIONS Methodology

- In December 2022, we conducted a global survey where we asked more than 2400 marketers, creatives, media owners, tech specialists and creative education bodies from 102 different countries their biggest challenges, opportunities and priorities for 2023.
- Supported throughout by insight from creative leaders and Lion-winning brands

The state of creativity today in numbers...

What the collective responses tell us on your challenges, opportunities and priorities for creativity

Biggest external challenges

54% Rising inflation and cost of living

47% Media and audience fragmentation

45% Understanding changing consumer habits

And internal challenges

50% Downward pressures on budgets

47% Demonstrating the link between creativity and business growth

45% Convincing stakeholders to invest in creativity

At a global level, macro economic pressures and the impact on budgets, along with a heightened focus to demonstrate the link between creativity and business growth, are the biggest challenges facing the creative community today.

On a regional level, the view is slightly different. In North and Central America, the recession is slightly less keenly felt - changing consumer habits are the biggest concern.

In Asia, the biggest external challenge is media and audience fragmentation. Europe sees the highest proportion of people citing inflation and the cost of living crisis as the biggest external challenge (56%).

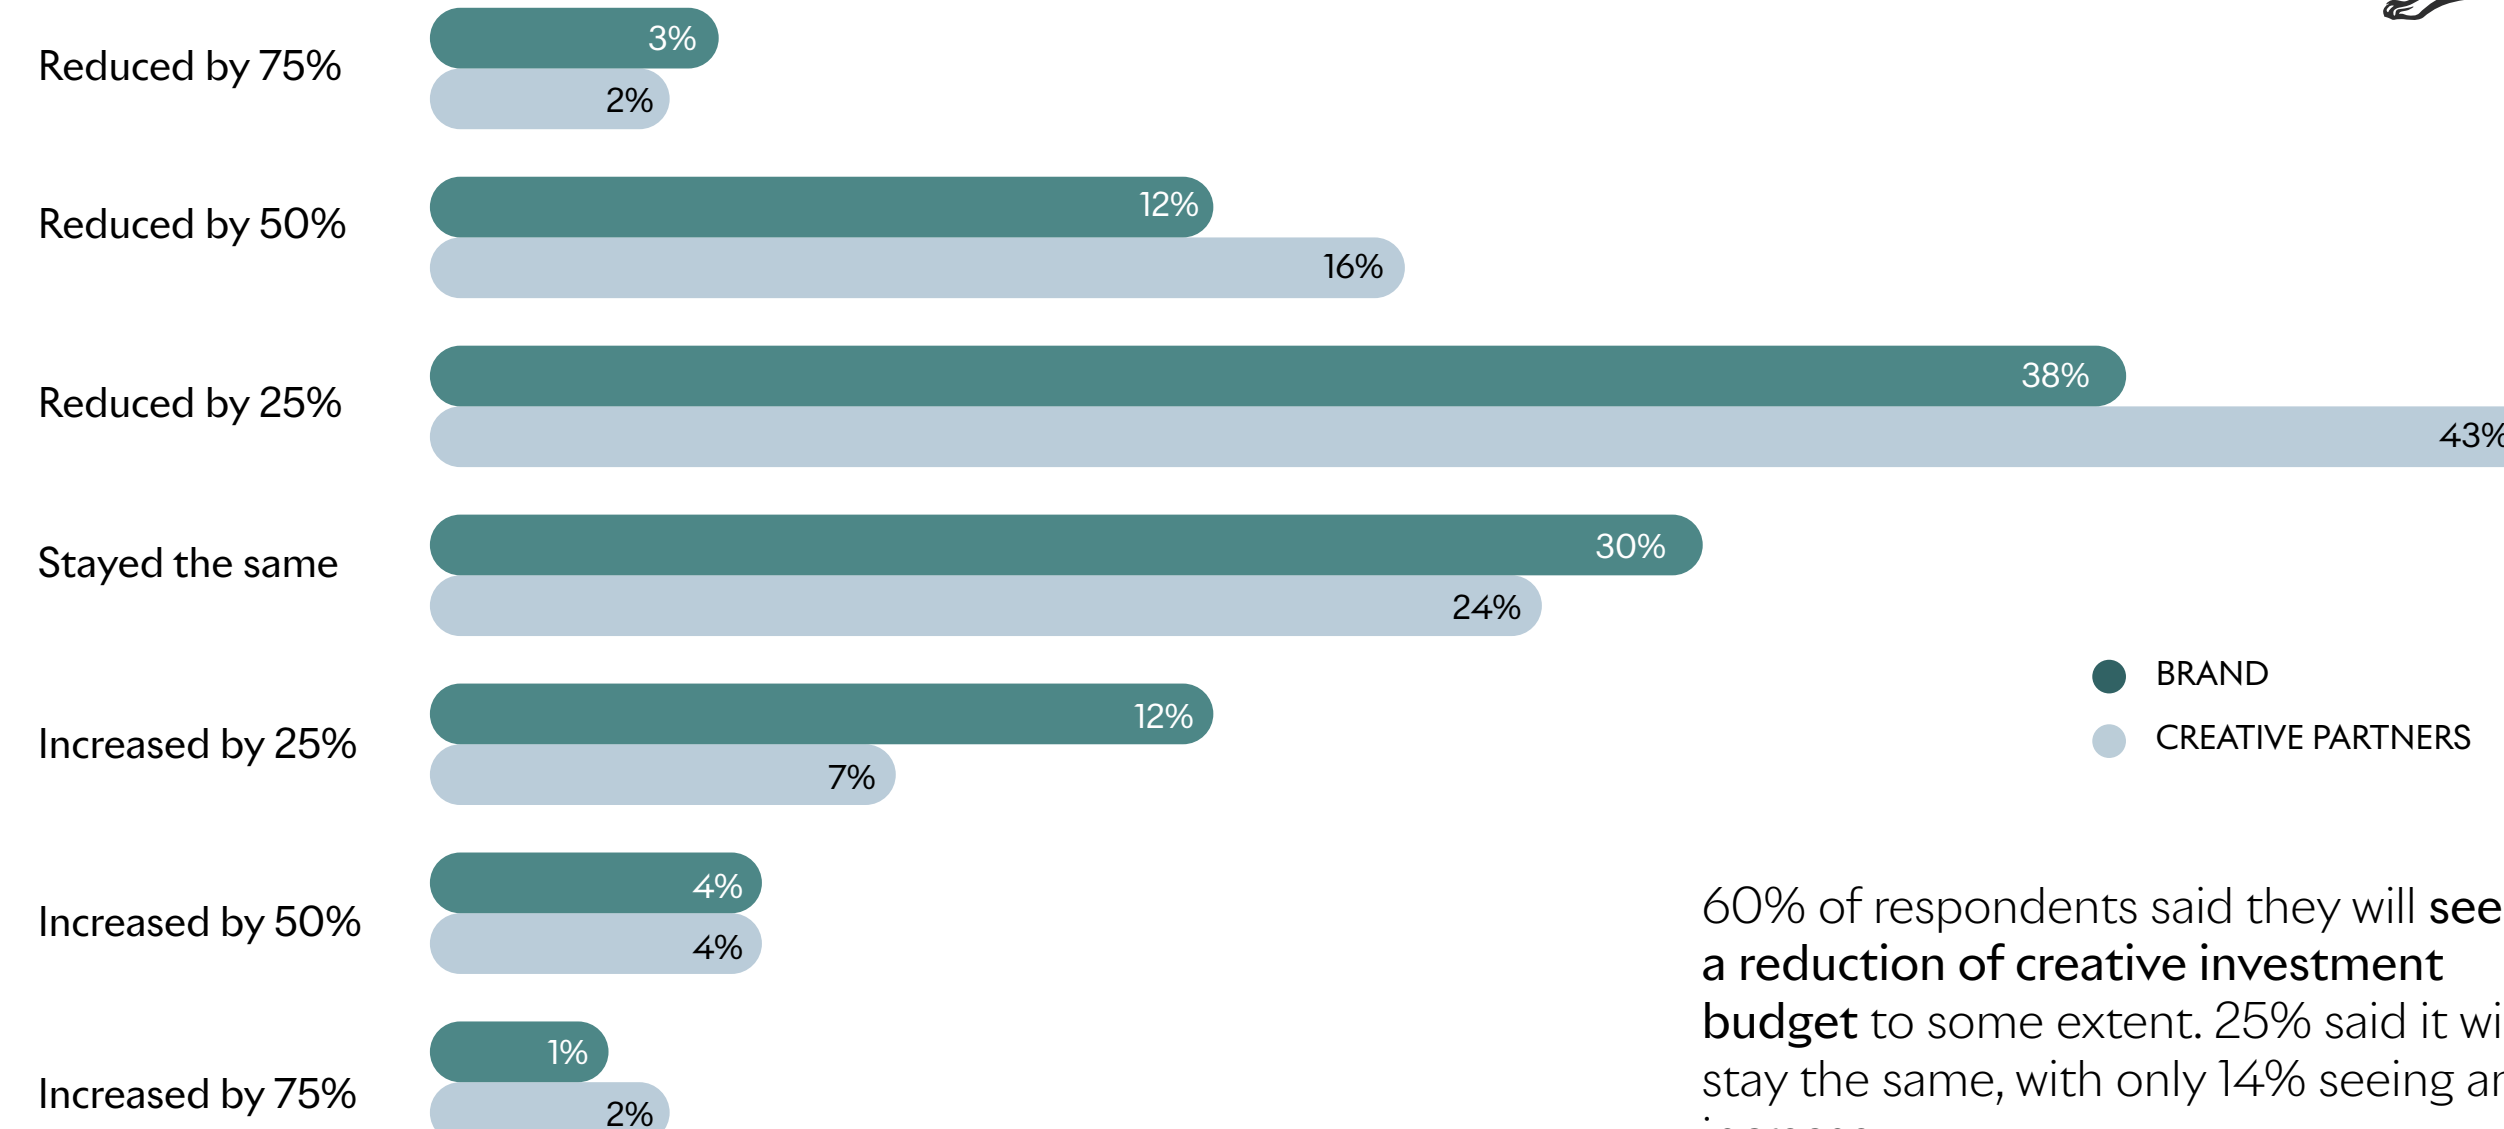

The state of creativity today in numbers...

Impact to creative investment budget

To what extent has the prospect of recession impacted your budget for creative investment

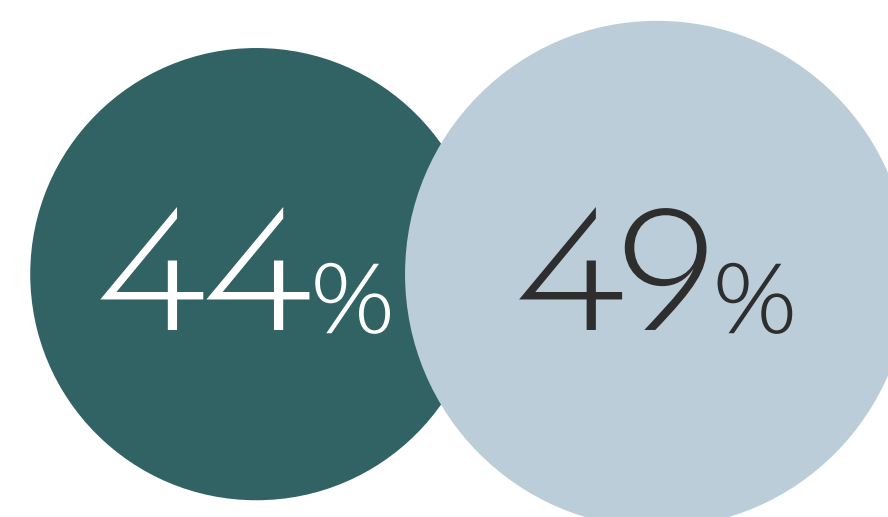

60% of respondents said they will see a reduction of creative investment budget to some extent. 25% said it will stay the same, with only 14% seeing an increase.

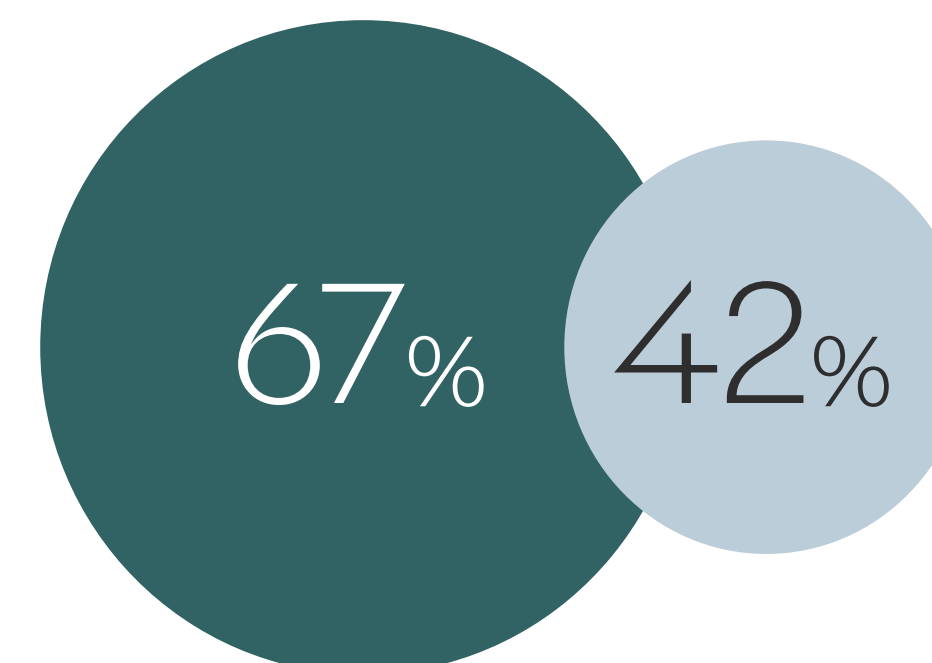

Priority for creative investments

Whilst brand leaders state they are prioritising investment in the customer journey, creative partners believe brand leaders are prioritising investment in targeted promotions and activations to drive sales uplift.

“Wanting to grow, but limited by budget”

The huge potential of the creative industry took centre stage in responses this year, but optimism was often offset by doubt.

Respondents questioned whether the industry could reach its full potential, saying it’s “limitless, but limited”. But to foster creativity, we must see these constraints as opportunities, not limitations.

We need to use small budgets as a catalyst for creativity, a way to look at challenges in different ways to find new solutions. 70 years of award winning work has taught us that creativity is found at the edges, and constraints are what push us there.

As one respondent put it, the industry may be “challenged by declining budgets, but it is more important than ever because of declining budgets”.

The state of creativity today in words...

Benefiting from more “cross-functional collaborative teams”

The survey revealed a positive shift toward “greater collaboration outside the creative domain”, with many praising its impact on innovation and problem solving.

“We are encouraging collaboration and open mindedness to work with groups and people outside of the creative team”

MIDDLE MANAGER | AGENCY (IRELAND)

This is an effective route to more diverse ideas. Joint research from Deloitte Digital and LIONS revealed that one of the key elements of successful creative business transformation is finding “hidden” creatives from unlikely sources –not just every employee across the business, but also external partners, suppliers, and customers.

“Too focused on tech, not enough on art”

The next decade will be about balancing tech with art. There is a lot of hype around technology and its impact on creativity, but rather than see one as more critical than the other, there is more value in seeing the power of the two together.

“It’s no longer technology vs. creativity...technology and creativity must be linked for true creativity and impact.”

SENIOR EXECUTIVE | AGENCY (CANADA)

You told us “when hiring people who code, we must not forget to also hire creatives”. Keep the balance between mind and machine.

“New technology has given new boost/ inspiration to creativity. It extends the boundary and imagination for creativity. The new challenge is on having the right talents and teams who can master the new skill and blend with the traditional craft of storytelling and brand experience building.”

SENIOR EXECUTIVE | AGENCY (ASIA)

Top Trends

Results of our research find that synergism will be the driving force behind groundbreaking creativity over the next few years. Here we uncover four of the most powerful alliances that emerged from the survey.

TREND

1 Mind meets Machine

DETAIL

“As AI surges, creativity is needed more than ever”.
65% of respondents cited AI as the most important tech trend in 2023, and more than a third of respondents plan to experiment with signal based marketing through AI. Lion winners show AI enabling hyper-personalisation, and creativity at scale.
The big question on everyone’s mind is “How can we harness its power rather than be threatened by it?”

ACTION

Amplify human creativity by co-creating with AI

TREND

2 Elevate Short-term Tactics

DETAIL

“[Clients] are betting on short-term strategies whilst maintaining brand essence”. As rising inflation and the cost of living bite, almost half of respondents (48%) are prioritising investment in targeted promotions to drive sales uplift above brand-building and customer experience. As short term demands grow, you’re asking: what short-term creative approaches will also benefit brands in the long-run?

ACTION

Inject more brand-building devices into your short-term activations

TREND

3 Community Collaboration

DETAIL

Downward pressures on budget (cited by 50% as the biggest internal challenge) are leading to resourceful creativity. Added to this “paid media on social” gleaned the highest rating for “best value for money”. It’s no surprise then that 74% of brands and 64% of creative partners are choosing to “work with content creators” in 2023. Popularity for the big social platforms is in the mix; so how should you engage in community building via the creator economy this year?

ACTION

Collaborate more with the creator economy

TREND

4 Process for Progress

DETAIL

For creativity to flourish, leaders and employees need tools, methods and training. From collaboration across teams to making time to celebrate success and learn from failures, the biggest Lion winners show us that every creative journey requires commitment to a creative structure and process. In this section, you will learn how to turn specific structures and processes into creative effectiveness and growth.

YOUR NEXT STEPS

AI dominated responses in the survey this year, with 65% of brands and agencies citing it the most important emerging tech for 2023. According to Gartner, by 2025, 10% of all data produced, and 30% of all outbound marketing messages from large brands, will be from Generative AI.

Many welcome its efficiencies;

“AI is playing a much bigger role in the field of creativity. It is used more and more to enhance creativity as it provides new tools and platforms that make it easier for people to be creative”.

Others worry it will damage creativity;

“Will AI generation kill the creative industry through ChatGPT, Dalle-E and all the other daily appearing AI tools?”.

Our recommendation is to cautiously embrace AI. Mind and machine shouldn't be an “either-or” in the context of creativity. The best ideas come from the crossroads of creativity, technology and humanity.

As the late Author Ken Robinson said, imagination and creativity are what fundamentally set us apart from anything else on earth. For now, that still includes AI. Success will come from combining the attributes that set us apart from technology, with those that set technology apart from us.

“Creativity is at risk of competing with AI, so creatives should define what makes them as creative human beings different from AI, what unique skills they have that cannot be replaced with AI.”

MARKETING MANAGER | BRAND

i. Enhance creative agility

“AI is playing a much bigger role in the field of creativity. It is used more and more to enhance creativity as it provides new tools and platforms that make it easier for people to be creative. It dramatically reduced the time and effort needed to generate new ideas or concepts.”

DIRECTOR | AGENCY

AI offers the creative industry more agility, a ‘luxury’ you have been asking for. Last year, you told us that mundane tasks are eating into your opportunities to get creative. It is now an option to use the tools we have been anticipating to free up more time.

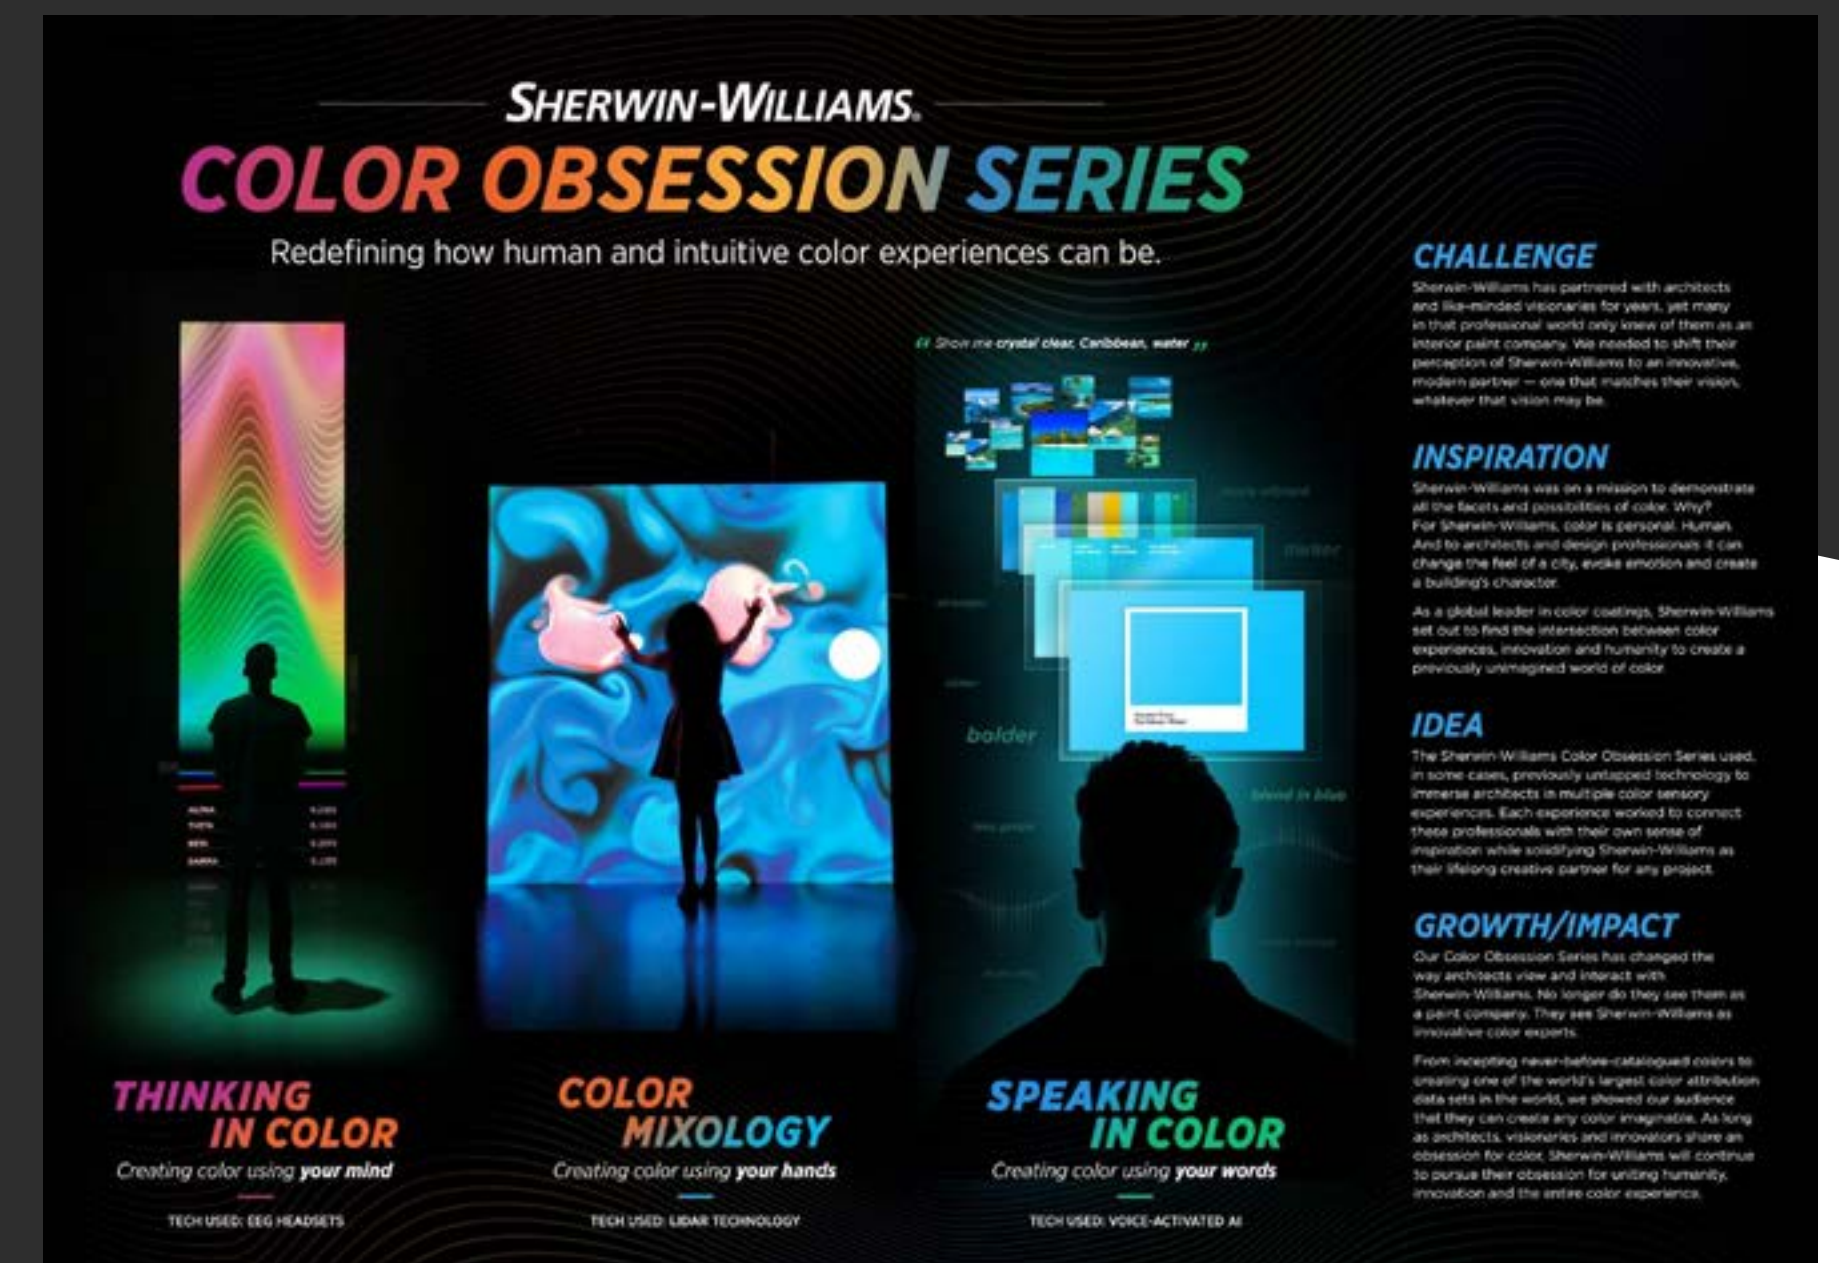

Take the Creative B2B Lions Grand Prix winner by paint company Sherwin-Williams. Speaking in Color is an AI-powered paint tool for architects so they can create custom colours through voice.

Speaking the words “drinking champagne on the French Riviera at sunset” triggers the technology to search millions of images to find the exact colour in your head.

This tool can turn hours of manual work into seconds. But it’s still reliant on human ideas and imagination to work. It presents a balanced way to bring AI and humans together - using tech to enhance productivity, not remove creativity.

ii. Scale through hyper-personalisation

Deepfakes are shaping creative experiences.

Although synthetic media can spark ethical concern, Lion-winning work has shown promising applications that deliver cost-effective, high-quality, highly personalised and scalable creative.

Cadbury Celebrations took hyper-personalisation to a new level by allowing small local businesses to make India's biggest celebrity – Shah Rukh Khan – its own brand ambassador. Anyone could recreate his face and voice to promote their business.

It demonstrates how AI can be applied as a tool to power a human idea. And how brands can now venture into new spaces that allow for personalisation at scale.

Consider a working environment that encourages the sharing of unimaginable creativity. And collaborate with experts across the business and externally to see how AI can help to make them happen.

iv. Bring people and tech together for more equitable solutions

AI-powered tools can help to democratise experiences.

Project Convey uses AI to help people on the autism spectrum better identify non-verbal social cues. It translates emotion into an emoji, allowing someone with autism to better understand the conversation. This solution was the result of a powerful collaboration between creatives, people on the autism spectrum and technology.

“The community often uses the phrase “nothing about us without us”. We teamed up with a specialist autism doctor and a media arts school for people on the spectrum. They helped us design everything from the colours to the movement of the emojis.”

Talking about creating McEnroe vs McEnroe, Alex Abrantes, Group Creative Director at FCB New York, said this:

“Choose your partners carefully. There will be moments when things won’t go well. You’ll be faced with situations where you’ll either point fingers or hold hands. Luckily, we had the right partners and everybody was working towards the same goal”.

2 Use AI to help to solve business problems.

The Prevention Grid implemented machine learning and AI to see the grid in real time and anticipate wildfire risks. This operational innovation has changed the way we monitor, maintain, and repair the power grid.

Inject more brand- building devices into your short-term activations 2

The rising cost of living and inflation is the most significant challenge for brands and creative partners (54%). And the knock-on impact on budgets is keenly felt. 60% of respondents expect a reduction of 25% or more to marketing budgets.

The pressure is on to be resourceful with that budget and prove its value in the short-term. 60% of respondents in this survey will primarily focus on short-term activations this year.

It goes against the optimum split for UK-based marketing effectiveness that Peter Field and Les Binet advocate (on average 60% into brand-building, 40% into short-term tactics). However, it's a reality most marketers are facing.

New research shows that brands benefit from including features of longer-term brand-building in all their advertising. So how can the industry be more creative with its approach to short-term marketing?

"In 2023, creativity will once again be challenged by those who demand more short-term, sales-oriented work. And the brands who come out on top will once again be those who dare to focus on audacious, long-term brand-building creative."

MIDDLE MANAGER | BRAND (SWEDEN)

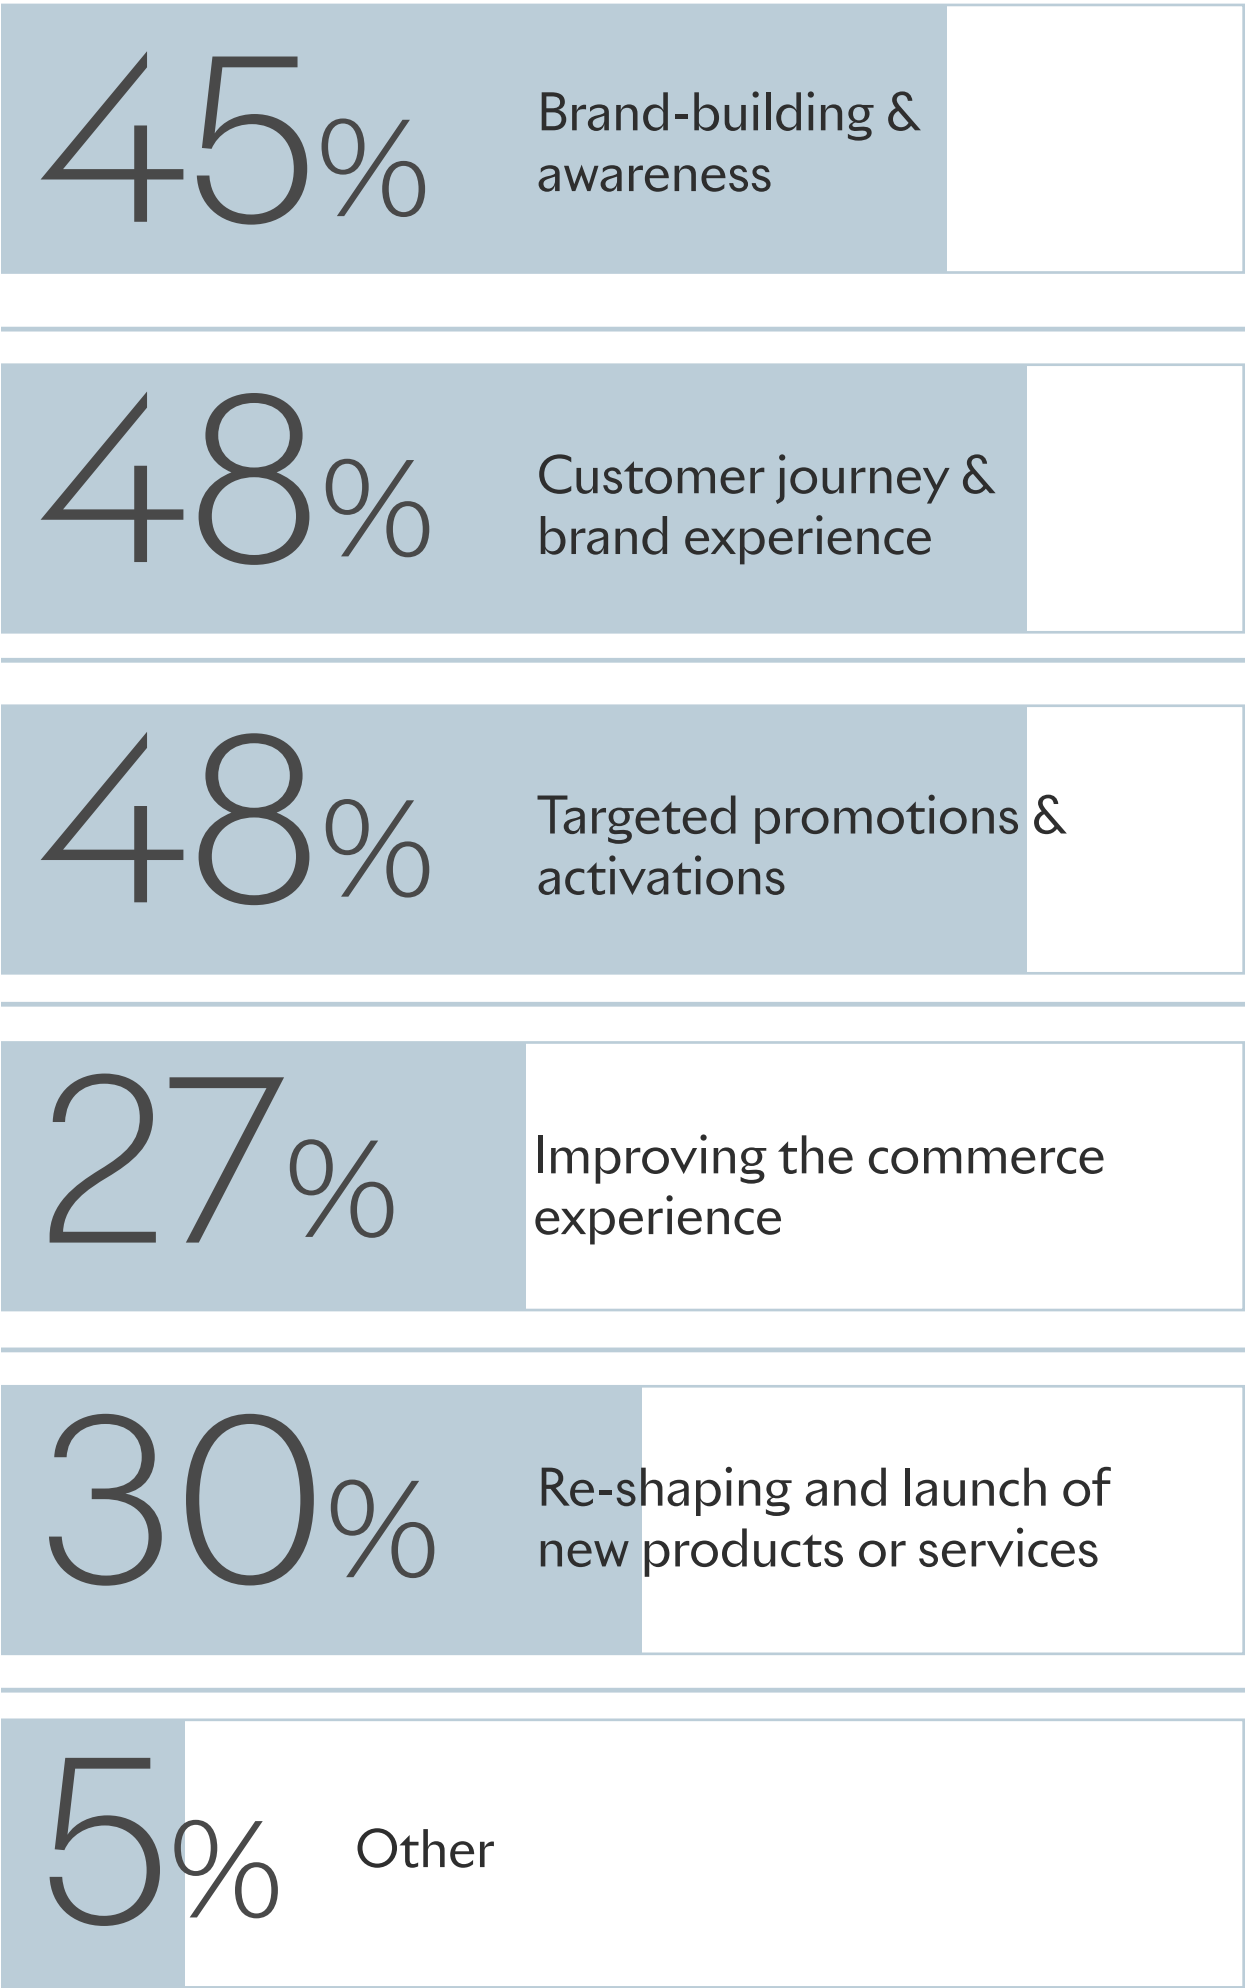

You told us...

We asked where you will be prioritising your creative investments in 2023, and you told us this...

- 1. Targeted promotions
- 2. Enhancing the customer journey
- 3. Brand-building

Brand-building was knocked out of first place this year as more people focus their investment on targeted promotions. Targeting is effective in the short term, but it needs to be balanced with brand-building to generate future demand.

Fortunately, brand-building is still a top priority for many. WARC and Kantar’s recent Creative Quality Report advised brands to ‘build components into all of your advertising that can work to benefit building future brand demand, regardless of singular objectives’.

Recent findings reinforce the need to avoid overinvestment in short-term activations. Instead, we should be looking at how to strengthen short-term activations with brand-building devices.

Action points:

- 1 Synchronize your short and long-term marketing
- 2 Inject more brand-building devices into short-term activations

Without the option to shift investment, the need for synergy grows stronger. Brands like Dove demonstrate the power of a two-pronged approach. It synergises its strategy; for every brand-building creative that provokes an emotional response around self-esteem, it releases a product-based and benefit-driven ad.

“One of Dove’s success factors across the years has been its ability to orchestrate a comprehensive communication architecture – a term that has somehow been lost in today’s marketers’ glossary.

It’s balancing highly persuasive product focused communications with powerful emotional content, both able to build the brand equity and business results in the short and in the long term.

The first by driving functional superiority credentials and the second one by building a unique emotional connection with the viewers.

It’s the synergy between the two that makes the magic.”

Dove repeated messaging on Instagram to young girls encouraging them to see that the only likes that matter are for themselves.

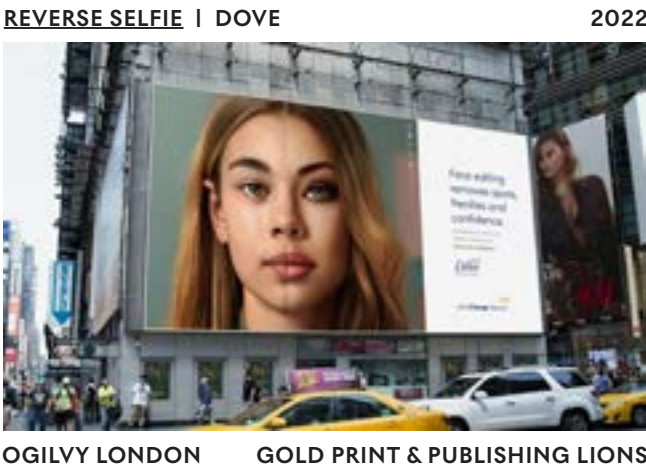

Dove launched 'Change the Rhyme'. The campaign challenged audiences to re-write definitions of beauty by penning alternative versions of a famous rhyme.

Dove juxtaposed the beauty of front-line healthcare workers' courageous acts against images of them at the end of their shifts, which would not traditionally be considered beautiful. In doing so, it redefined beauty as something you do and not how you look.

At the same time, Dove was driving its functional superiority across markets, including promoting its deodorants main benefit: not leaving any white residues on black clothes.

Dove pulled back on brand-building.

Dove was promoting its invisible deodorant, curly hair products and more.

Dove was promoting specific product features across markets - like products for hair loss to women in Malaysia.

Dove launched 'Love Your Curls' as well as benefit messaging around many other product features.

OGILVY PARIS, PARIS

Dove installed a weather-sensitive digital billboard in Times Square, New York, in April to promote its body wash.

Product campaigns running across the world, including powerful communications around Afro hair care.

Unilever, the global FMCG company, with brands including Dove, is leaning on strong brand equity as prices rise.

Take a bite out of Snickers' playbook

Snickers' 'You're Not You When You're Hungry' has been effective as a brand-building message in mass-reach media, but also as a way to trigger short-term sales campaigns specific to local markets.

As part of this long-standing campaign, Snickers released 'Hungerithm' in Australia to elicit a more immediate purchasing response from consumers. This was a bespoke algorithm that dropped the price of bars as the internet got 'hangrier', triggering a 67% year-on-year increase during the promotional period.

This shows how a creative approach to promotions that aligns with brand-building can inspire sales spikes and benefit your business in the long-run.

ii. Build a brand community

As budgets tighten, building connections in online communities will become an important tool for brands. They offer an opportunity to both build your brand and to create a home for short-term promotional activations

Under Armour teased the launch of its digital sneaker with a community of basketball fans on Twitter and Discord to build anticipation and exclusivity. When it did launch, 4.5 million people tried to buy the sneaker and they sold out in a few minutes.

This activity builds both brand consideration and a place to launch sales spikes campaigns. The stronger your presence in a community, the more effective these activations will be.

“Brands are developing creative and innovative ways to engage these diverse and passionate communities to drive growth.”

GLOBAL HEAD OF MARKETING | RIOT GAMES

Lessons from the Lions:

- Identify the communities your brand wants to earn the right to participate in. Spend time understanding who engages with them, their boundaries and where your brand can add value.
- Gather insights around what motivates that community and use them to incentivise people to engage with your brand.
- Bring the community into the ideation phase so they feel valued by the brand. Communities are not a place simply to promote products.

If you're in a lower interest category, consider collaborating with existing communities rather than building your own.

iii. Don't pigeonhole social media as a sales activation channel

Social media has traditionally been viewed as an avenue for delivering short-term activations. You told us you're focusing on "more targeted social promotion" and "social media short-term campaigns".

But social offers an opportunity for brands to combine both long-term brand-building with short-term promotional mechanics. A recent Kantar study revealed that social media can deliver long-term brand impact, especially on brand awareness and associations.

Seek out opportunities for storytelling in your short-term tactics. It is a top creative strategy for effective communication, especially brand-building.

iv. Bring entertainment back

Use entertainment to make your creative more memorable.

Burger King purposely added glitches into its app to disrupt consumers' experience in a negative way, but then promised rewards for every glitch they found. This compelled people to download the app, but also attracted them to explore and familiarise themselves with its loyalty features.

Counterbalancing negative feelings with the offer of something positive like discounts can be an effective technique for brand-building and immediate ROI. Burger King saw an 11% growth in consideration among young adults and sold 60,000 glitched coupons.

Position your brand as good value rather than a budget option. It will resonate more deeply with audiences.

‘It’s That Affordable’, for IKEA in Saudi Arabia, showed off the retailer’s low prices in a fun way: by comparing them to everyday items such as a take-away coffees and tubes of toothpaste. Sales soared 21.4% vs the same period the previous year.

Promotions don’t have to be dull. With the right injection of creativity they can be highly engaging and effective.

Electronics manufacturer Noblex increased sales of TVs in Argentina with a World Cup promotion offering refunds if the national team didn’t qualify.

Collaborate more with the creator economy 3

Economic concerns force brands and agencies to be more savvy with their strategy. Marketing investments have to work harder than ever. So with an economy of over 303 million people globally with the ability to reach billions, the creator economy will prove invaluable as budgets get squeezed.

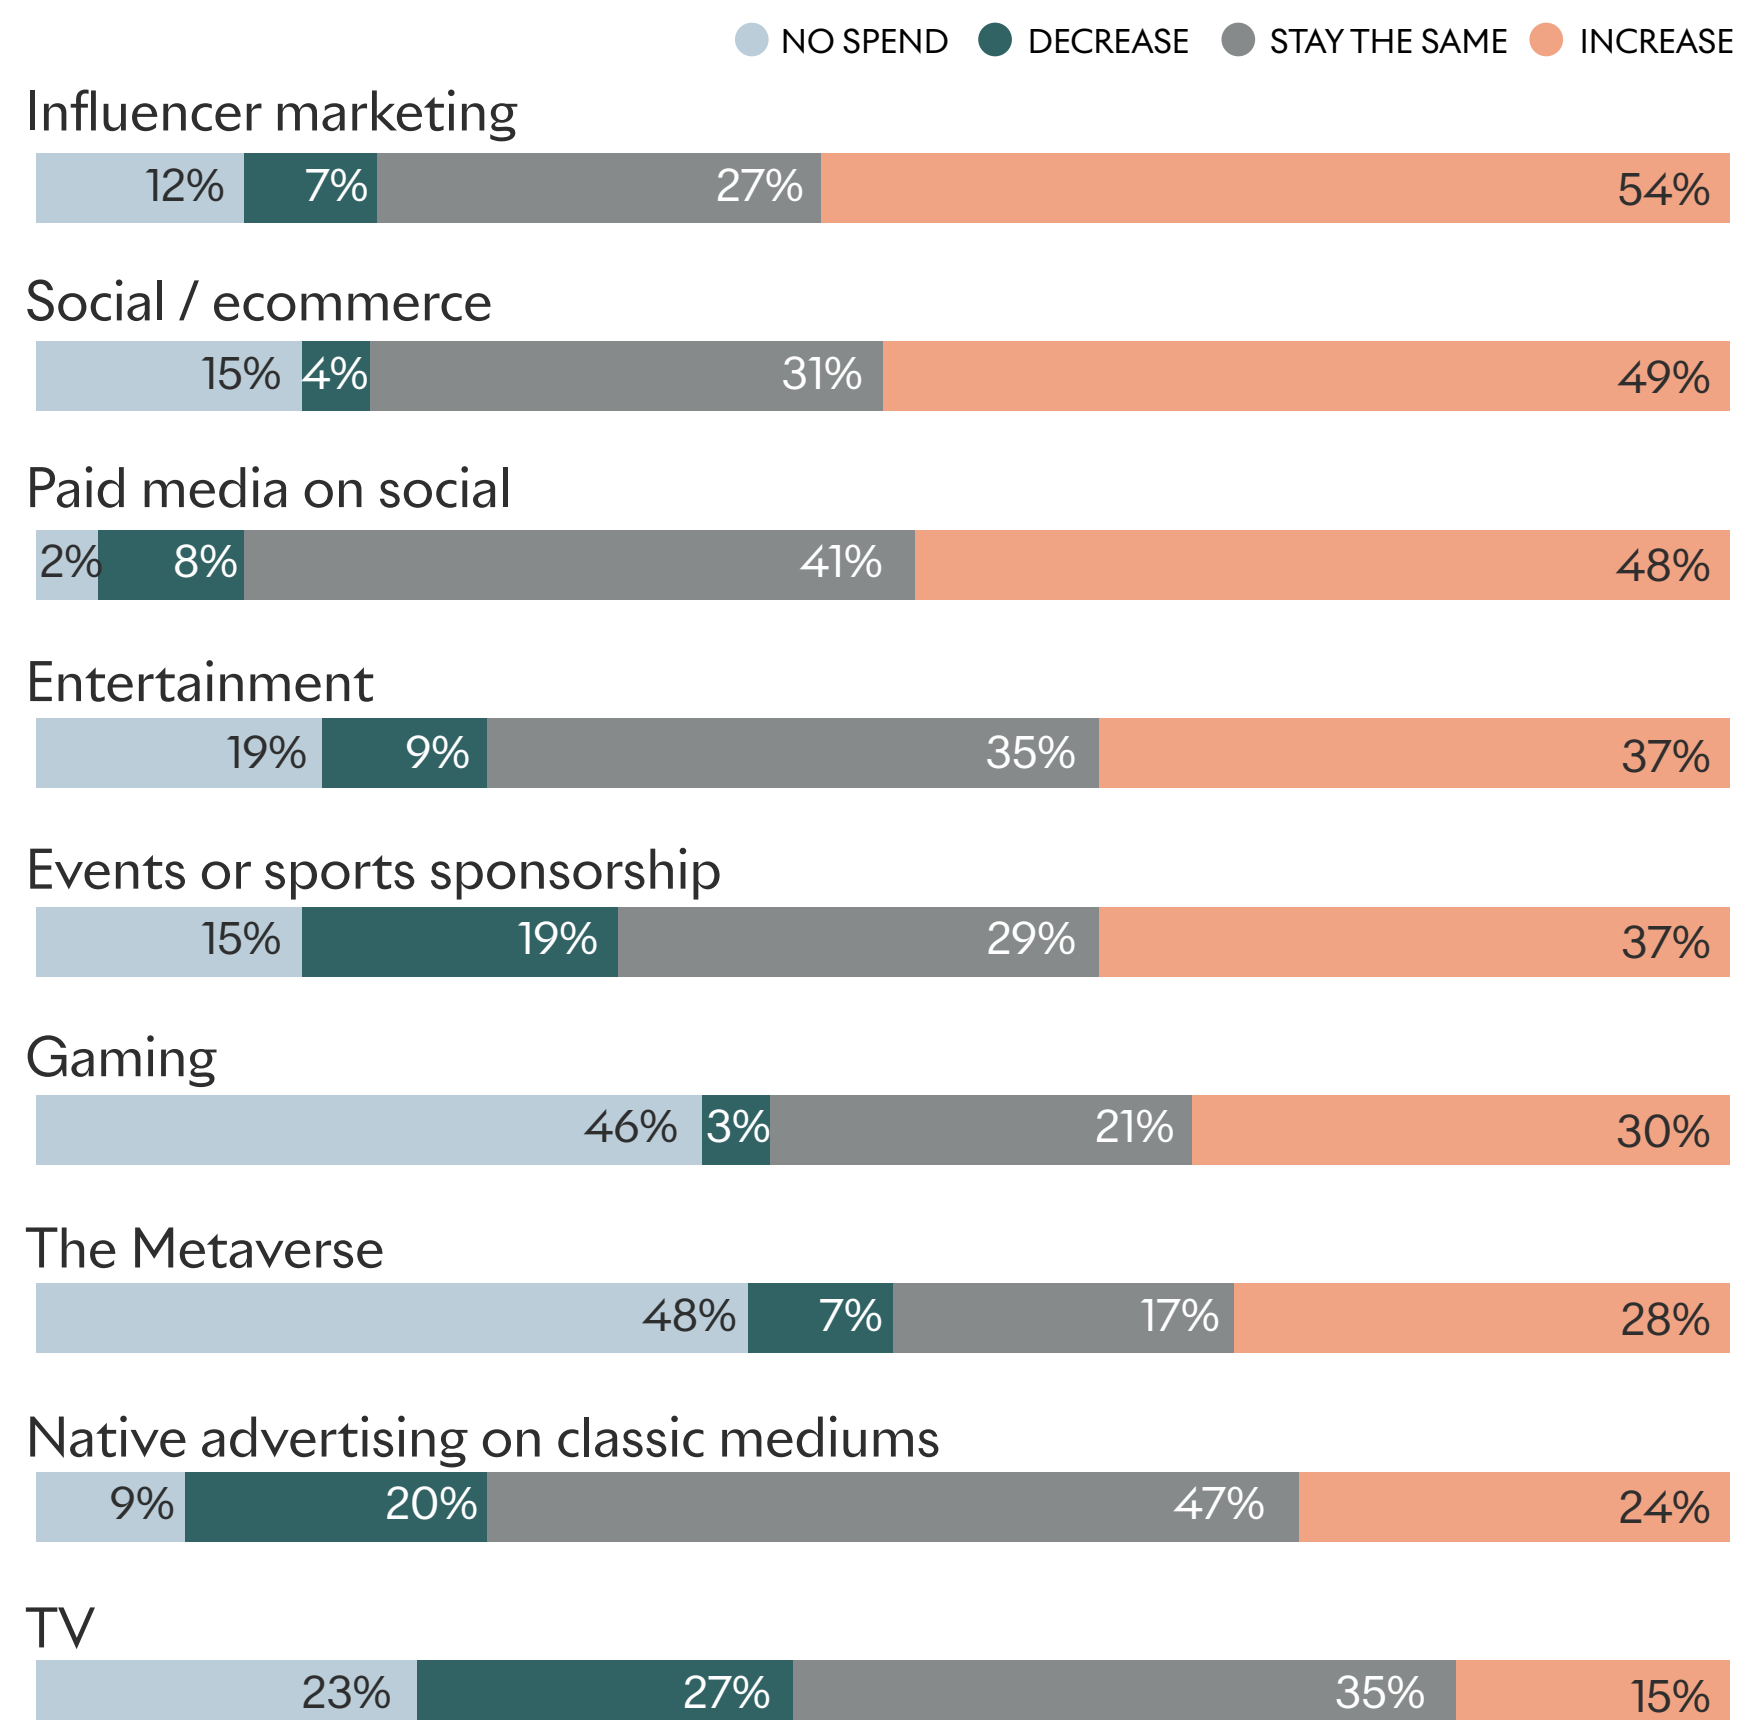

66% of brands and agencies are upping the ante with their investment into the creator economy this year. And 65% into building communities. Both offer authenticity, individuality and scalability - a winning combination with today's switched on and increasingly critical consumers.

In the Lions, the most effective work comes from those who can clearly define the connection between the brand and the creator.

As the market starts to crowd, how can your brand collaborate with the creator economy in a way that stands out?

You told us...

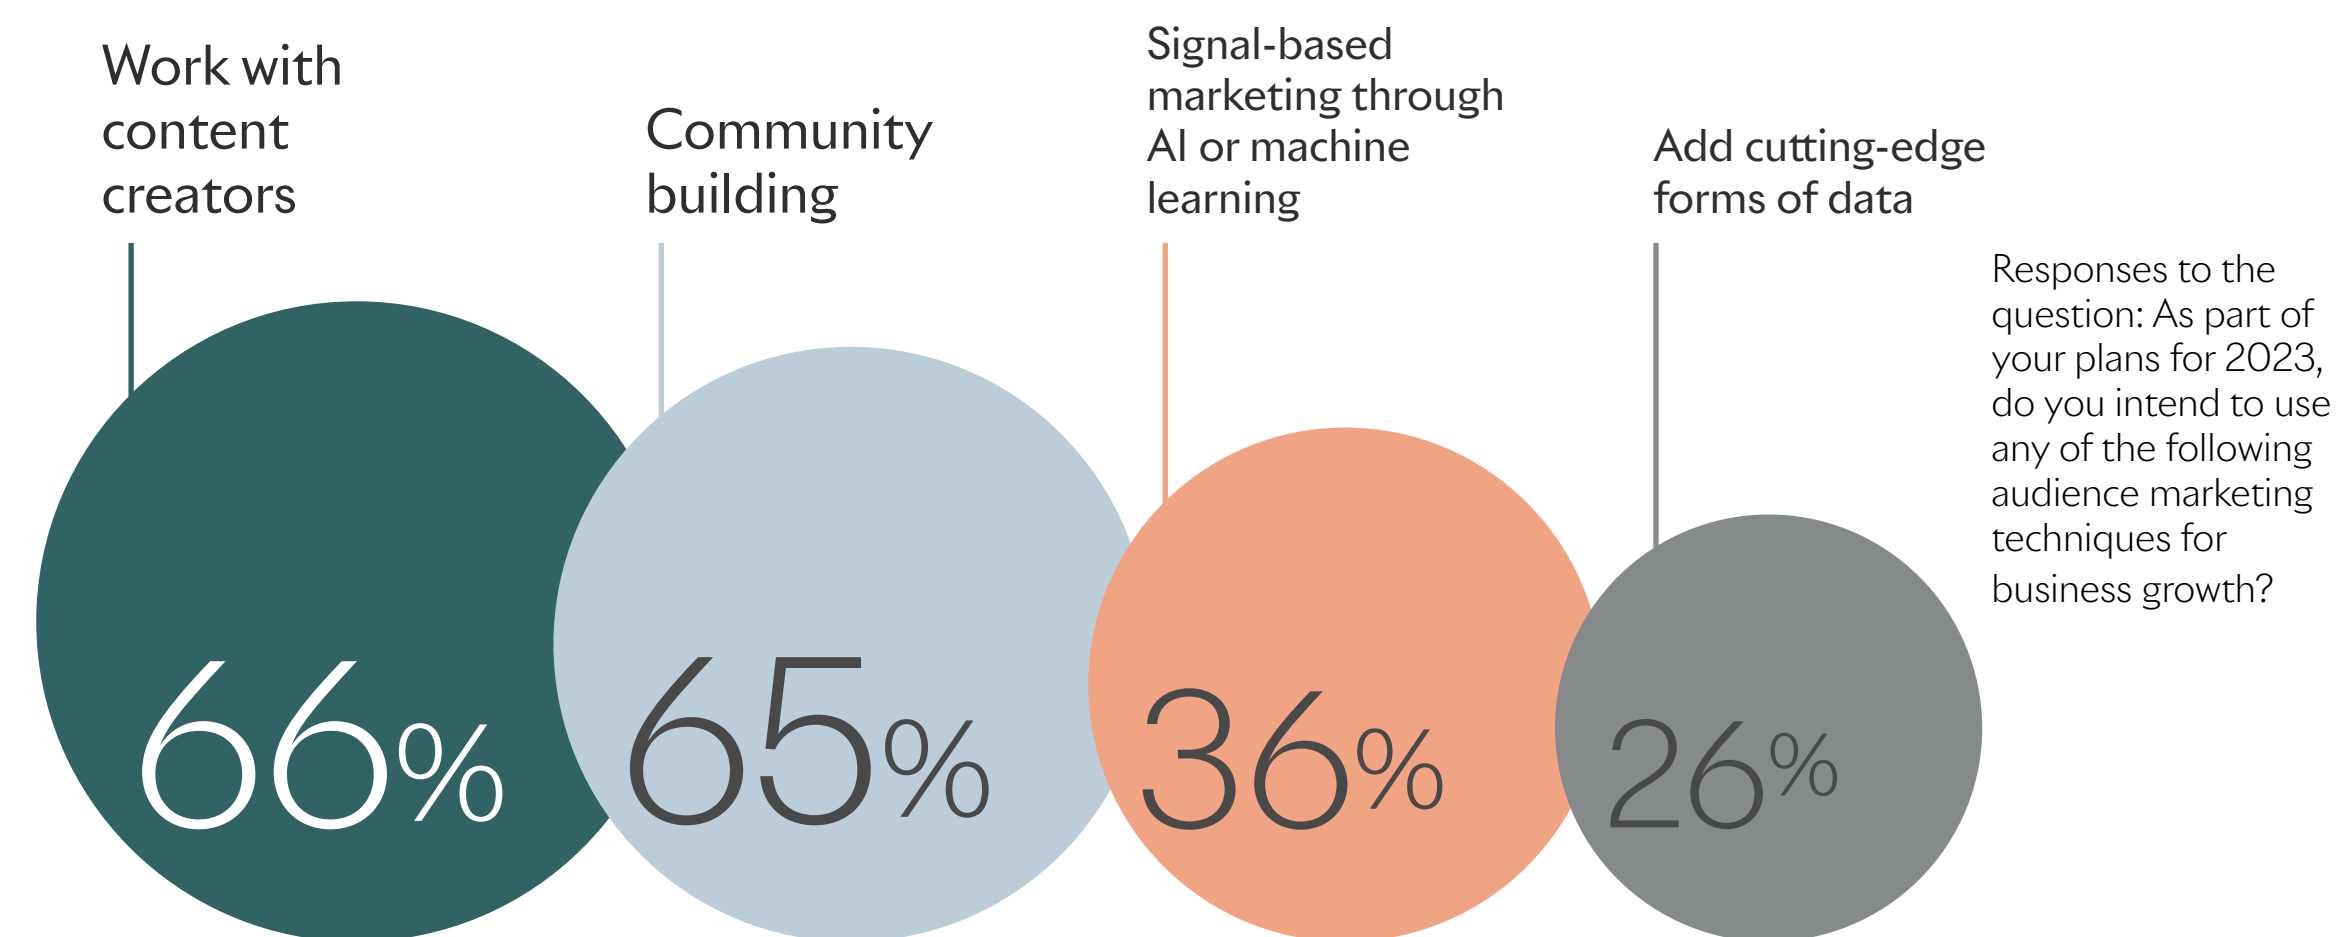

We asked how you expect investments in different media types to change in 2023. Influencer marketing came out on top as the activity where most brand respondents expect to increase investment (almost 54% indicated an increase).

Results from brand-side respondents

We also asked whether you intend to use any of the following audience marketing techniques for business growth. Over two thirds of respondents cited their intention to use community building and work with content creators as new marketing techniques to build business growth.

The Lion winners provide an array of examples of how brands have successfully engaged with influencers to build a relationship with new and existing communities. From the traits common to this work, two core actions stand out:

- 1 Take the time to get to know how online communities interact
- 2 Be prepared to respond at speed

Think beyond the traditional

Virtual influencers

WARC reports that 58% of consumers are now following at least one virtual influencer on social media. By definition a virtual influencer is someone who is computer-generated and is either fictional or a digital twin of someone who already exists.

SOS Children’s Villages created a new kind of influencer to convince corporations to transform marketing dollars into donations.

Ten year old Chatpat, a boy from the streets, recreated India’s most iconic commercials from the most recognisable brands, and then publicly offered those recreations to the brands on social media in exchange for donations to SOS.

Chatpat became a celebrity overnight. His recreated ads increased brand impressions by 1506% and raised over $300,000 in donations.

This unique approach demonstrates that the best creators can be found in even the most unlikely places and provides insight into the future of the creator economy.

“The task was to create a campaign that gives visibility and makes corporations donate. With no budget and a task like this, we knew we needed an influencer and we couldn’t afford an influencer. So, that’s how the sparkly idea of ‘let’s create an influencer’ was born.”

When Brahma Beer could no longer sponsor football jerseys in Brazil, it decided to sponsor the place footballers love to experiment with the most - their hair. Using players as influencers for the beer, The Foamy Haircut recreated the golden liquid colour of Brahma Beer and the iconic foam on top before the games.

Enhance creativity with structure

Structure and creativity. Friends or foes?

Some argue that structure and systems stifle creativity, saying it takes away the freedom to be innovative. But this study has shown that as creative budgets and delivery timeframes get squeezed, people need a bit of order to let creative excellence thrive. Out of a long list of key leadership attributes, the ability to “have a clear vision and strategy for how creativity can be harnessed by the company” was deemed the most important, chosen by more than a third of respondents.

Look at creativity and structure as two parts that can make each other stronger. Creativity requires “inspiration time, free from daily tasks” - a sparsity many cited as their biggest challenge in last year’s survey. When outward pressures impede on these aspects, a structured approach will guard these crucial rituals from being abandoned.

“Sometimes people believe that their creativity is the result of ingenuity and inspiration – and sometimes it is – but a lot of this can come through processes and discipline.”

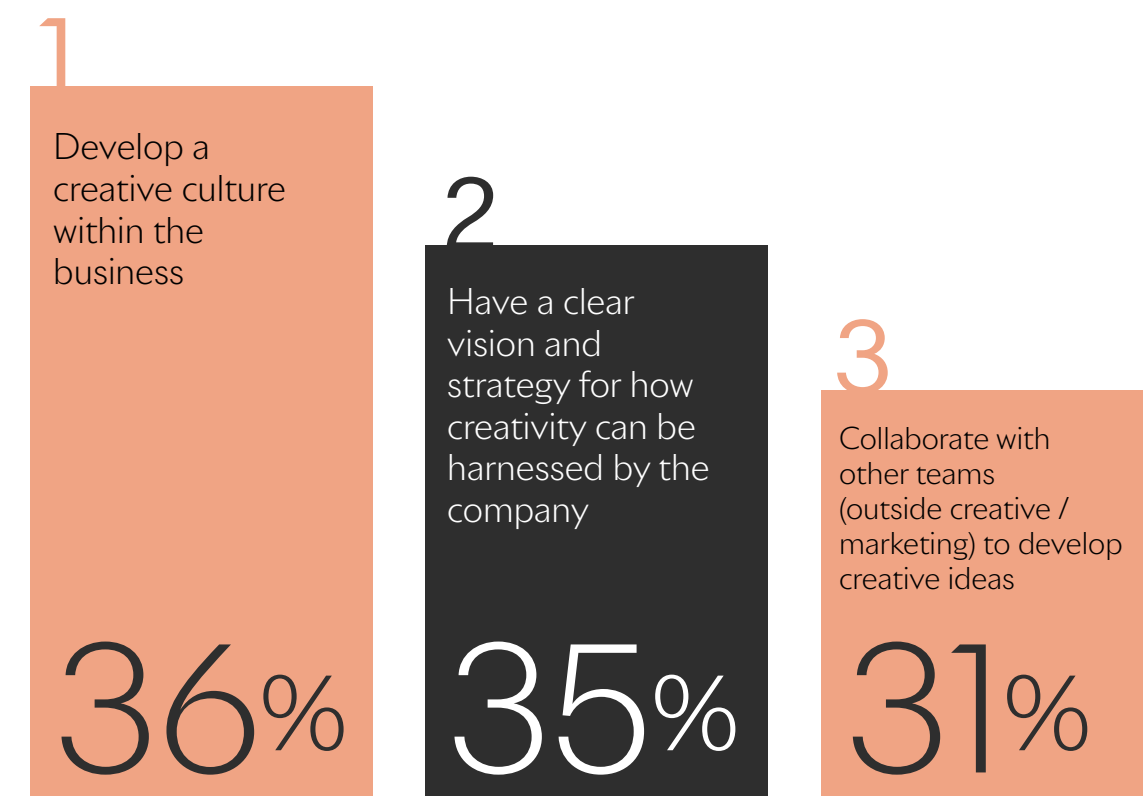

PEDRO EARP
FORMER CMO | AB INBEV

Like any other aspect of business, for creativity to flourish leaders and employees need tools, methods and training. From collaboration across teams to making time to celebrate success and learn from failures, the biggest Lion winners show us that every creative journey requires commitment to a creative structure and process.

You told us...

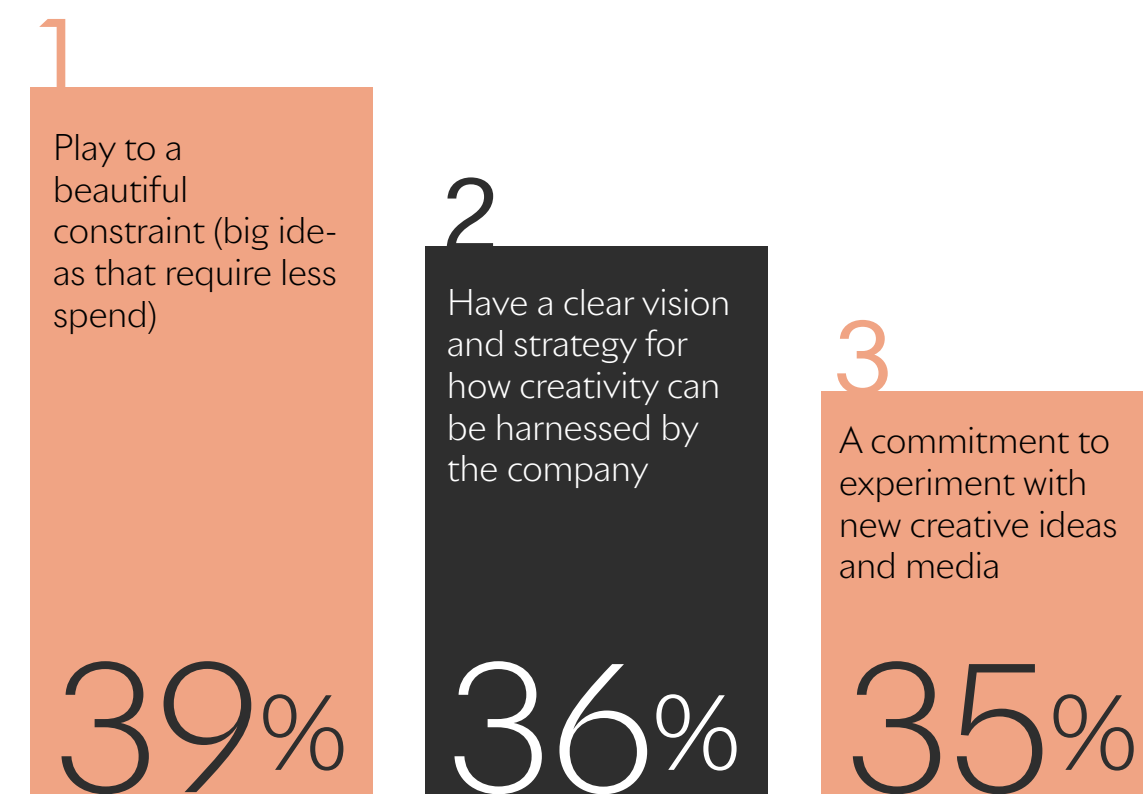

We asked brands to rank the three most important attributes for creative success in 2023, choosing from a long list of attributes.

Brands Respondents : Top three most important attributes for creative success

We asked creative partners to rank the three most important attributes to creative leadership and management, using the same list.

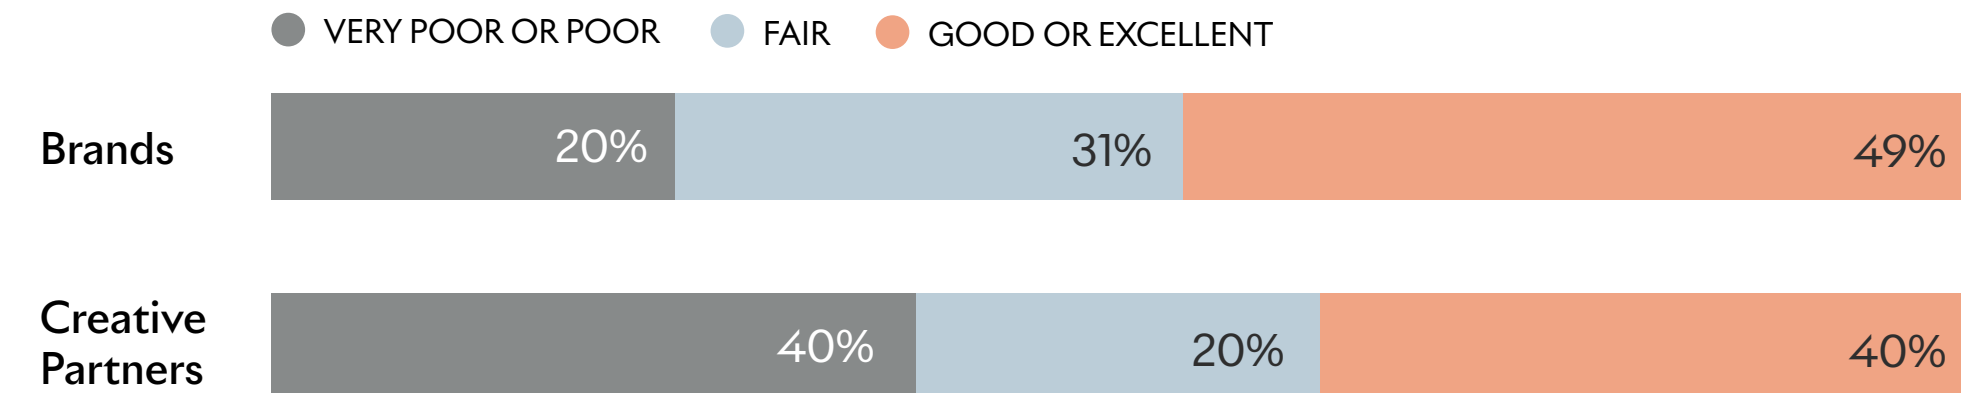

Creative Partners Respondents : Top three most important attributes for creative leadership

The answers above differ, as the data above shows. However, in each case brand and creative partner respondents deemed having a clear vision and strategy for how creativity can be harnessed by a company as a key attribute to creative success and leadership.

While this is deemed one of the most important attributes, less than half of brand respondents, and even fewer creative partners ranked their leadership as good or excellent in this area.

Creativity is likely to fall at the first hurdle if brands and creative partners do not have a clear vision and strategy for how it can be harnessed in a company. These two elements set the stage for the right structure, processes and culture for creative excellence to thrive. Discussions with the Lion winners provide multiple examples on how leaders can set and execute their creative strategies - including programmes that educate employees on creativity, and systems to bring structure to the creative development process.

The key actions:

- 1 Upskill leaders on how to build the right structure for creativity
- 2 Embed processes and programmes that strengthen creativity

Creative leaders are the link between creativity and structure. It is their responsibility to ensure teams are working in an efficient way that benefits creative output.

Never stop learning (or teaching)

“This is the time when everyone in marketing has to learn. If you don’t update yourself and become contemporary, you will get obsolete very soon. You cannot let that happen. So please invest in yourself, learn, learn, learn that’s what my advice would be.”

RAJA RAJAMANNAR
GLOBAL CHIEF MARKETING OFFICER | MASTERCARD

Leaders need to build creative structures around learning, actively teaching and inspiring young creatives around what drives excellence.

Practices working for your peers:

“Weekly team lunch & learns with outside experts; weekly trend report produced internally; culture of sharing industry ideas we find exciting and discussing why; peer review sessions.”

“Training each other on emerging creative tools, collaborating with partners and guest mentors”.

“Giving opportunities to young creatives to make final decisions, and support in case of fail.”

Make space for new ideas

As leaders start “focusing on processes to keep control of the workflow” they open up more opportunities for sharing.

Carrefour continuously improves its ‘Act for Food’ work - the Creative Business Transformation Lions Grand Prix winner. It does this by incentivising all employees to come up with new ideas (i.e., “Acts”). It has created a platform, “Act for Change”, to gather employee ideas. This has generated a range of new initiatives, from new product developments to innovation on production lines.

During the pandemic, AB InBev set up a smart process to distill insights quickly at a global level and used those to develop relevant ideas. Marketers globally across the organisation would meet twice a week to pitch their ideas and the ideas coming from their agencies.

McDonald’s opened up work to all markets through an internal creative hub, where employees and agency partners can view and share briefs and campaign content from all around the world, catalogued based on common business challenges. This direct access, leveraged during the early stages of campaign development, has helped the brand create a culture of sharing and scaling, building on insights and ideas that are working well for the company across different markets.

Lead by example

Putting a structure in place makes time for something you want to do. And it is a leader’s duty to show its ok to use that time to flex creative muscles.

Patagonia’s founder Yvon Chouinard used to eat lunch with his staff every day; this helped build a strong community and encouraged employees to take time away from the screen. This informal daily structure shaped the creative culture immensely.

Many of you pointed toward the need to “flatten the company structure” and “reduce the top down traditional leadership style”. As Patagonia demonstrates, this means participating in the elements that drive creativity alongside all of the other employees.

Structure for effectiveness:

You told us the industry needs to find and use “common methods and processes to be able to build creative ideas faster”. We have pulled together some of the processes Lion winners employ to get to highly effective solutions at speed. Putting these steps in place will not only bolster creative output but heighten the chances of getting it right the first time.

1 Always start with the problem to be solved

Start by identifying the single most important problem that needs to be solved. Too often, creatives and marketers can jump to big ideas and try to work backwards.

“Fall in love with the problem, not the idea. Remember, most ideas that fail do so because they aim to solve a problem which no-one really has.”

2 Map impact goals

Creative Marketer of the Year, AB InBev, marks all its work against a creative spectrum - a scale from one to ten that helps it set the creative ambition for a campaign. Dimitri Michailidis, Global Director for Brand & Creative Effectiveness, AB InBev told us that this allows teams to talk in the same language on a global level. It also helps teams build acumen and intuition on what great creativity looks like.

3 Use setbacks as a springboard for solutions

Ideas need to be viewed from many different angles, this may mean watching them get torn apart to be reassembled. This is an essential process when creating permanent solutions.

Doconomy faced countless setbacks when creating a method for small and mid-sized companies to measure the carbon footprint of their products. As it overcame each challenge, it discovered new solutions that would become essential to the final product.

4 Monitor and celebrate creative impact

Evidently it’s important to put systems in place to monitor the impact of creative work on business results. It strengthens the case for further investment in creativity.

It’s as important to celebrate successes along the way. For creativity to thrive, you have to constantly feed it and enrich it. Celebration is an integral way to boost confidence in creative endeavours. Can you bring teams together to celebrate successes and also discuss some of the opportunities where work can improve?

Don’t forget:

Clearly communicating the positive financial impact of your creative activity is important to get executive buy-in. Consider how you can bring a finance lead into your team structure to help communicate effectiveness to the board. For Mastercard, that meant hiring a Finance Director to report into the Chief Marketing Officer so they could communicate with the CEO and CFO in terms they can relate to.

McDonald's Creative Effectiveness Programme

The Creative Effectiveness Program launched by McDonald's marked an important marketing shift for the brand. It provided it with a structured approach to creativity, which includes the following:

Establish a common ground. McDonald's feeds a 'feel-good' approach into its marketing. This ensures the marketing leans into the emotional connection of the iconic brand around the world, using McDonald's Creative Scale to set a common framework.

Be a strong advocate for capability building. McDonald's does this by leading workshops, webinars and masterclasses for over 2,000 marketers worldwide.

Celebrate to motivate. To celebrate best-in-class work, McDonald's hosts its annual Feel-Good Marketing Awards. It took the fourth annual show to the metaverse. It created a virtual "10th floor at MHQ" where it connected its marketers and agency partners in a space with unlimited potential.

Culturally Relevant Bravery

Sharing and Scaling

Build a connected global marketing community. McDonald's has achieved this by bringing its employees together, across markets, to join forces and create campaigns. It refers to this as 'the power of one.'

Lean on your 'council'. McDonald's has a global Creative Council with top marketers from around the world. The council helps set and embed the agenda each year for continually elevating creative excellence and effectiveness.

Share to scale. Through its online portal, The Creative Hub, employees and agency partners can view and share best-in-class McDonald's briefs and work. This helps the brand to spotlight the best ideas and scale them quickly.
