the 1990s, the number of people who have been employed in the public sector has increased in all countries. The increase has been particularly rapid in the United Kingdom, where the public sector has grown from 12.5% of the economy in 1980 to 20.5% in 1997 (OECD 1998).

There are a number of reasons for the increase in public sector employment. One reason is that the public sector has become a more important part of the economy. This is due to a number of factors, including the fact that the public sector has become a more important provider of social services, and that it has become a more important employer of people with specific skills.

Another reason for the increase in public sector employment is that the public sector has become a more attractive employer. This is due to a number of factors, including the fact that the public sector has become a more stable employer, and that it has become a more attractive employer for people who are looking for a long-term career.

There are a number of challenges facing the public sector in the future. One challenge is that the public sector will need to continue to grow in order to meet the needs of the population. This will require the public sector to continue to invest in infrastructure and social services, and to continue to attract and retain skilled workers.

Another challenge is that the public sector will need to continue to improve its efficiency and effectiveness. This will require the public sector to continue to reform its structure and processes, and to continue to invest in training and development for its workers.

There are a number of ways in which the public sector can continue to grow and improve. One way is to continue to invest in infrastructure and social services, and to continue to attract and retain skilled workers. Another way is to continue to reform the structure and processes of the public sector, and to continue to invest in training and development for its workers.
