The gold standard in pathology education for over 50 years

Pathology at a Glance: A Complete Visual Guide with Mind Maps

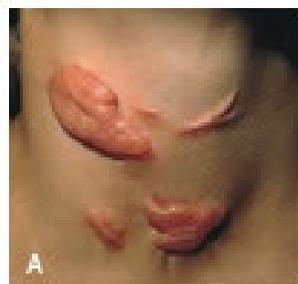

- In-depth, state-of-the-art overview of diseases from cellular to systemic pathology.
- Includes new advances in molecular biology, disease classifications, and drug therapies.
- 1,000+ high-quality full-color photos, diagrams, and schematics aid faster and deeper understanding.
- Boldface overviews, summary tables, key concept boxes, and schematic diagrams for quick revision and clear retention.
- Covers COVID-19, microbiome, immunopathology, and targeted therapies.
- Ideal For - MBBS students, residents, exam preparation (including USMLE), and clinical reference.

Fig. 3.2 Formation of exudates and transudates. (A) Normal hydrostatic pressure (blue arrows) is about 32 mm Hg at the arterial end of a capillary bed and 12 mm Hg at the venous end; the mean colloid osmotic pressure of tissues is approximately 25 mm Hg (green arrow), which is equal to the mean capillary pressure. Therefore, the net flow of fluid across the vascular bed is almost nil. (B) An exudate is formed in inflammation because vascular permeability increases due to increased interendothelial spaces. (C) A transudate is formed when fluid leaks out because of increased hydrostatic pressure or decreased osmotic pressure.

Fig. 3.3 Principal mechanisms of increased vascular permeability in inflammation. Vascular permeability is increased by chemically induced retraction of endothelial cells (B) or endothelial injury (C) compared with normal endothelium (A).

Textbook of Pathology, 2nd Edition
